Ames and Madison. The Record of a Stormy debate in the First Congress.

There were three sessions of the first Congress held under the Constitution of the United States. The two first, sessions constituted an epoch in American history. They were held here in New York in the old City Hall, at the corner of Wall and Nassau streets. Here, too, on the balcony of the same building Washington was inaugurated President, April 30, 1789. It cupies the same site. It is a reproach to American character that some such historical monument was not long ago placed on the spot where Washington took the Presidential oath, with the solemn words: "I swear-so help me God!" and Chancellor "Long live George Washington, President of United States,"

Two questions of vital interest to the whole people had to be met at the threshold of the Government upon which the two great rival parties of Federalists and was stirred up, and differences of opinion seemed to be irreconcilable. These were the plan of Alexander Hamilton in favor of the assumpsion by Government of the debts of the several States, and the measure known as the residence question for the selection of a permanent seat of Government. The thirteen original States were almost rent asunder in the very hour of their union by the conflict of views upon these two questions. The excitement was increased by a debate which had just taken place upon the bill to fund the public debt. The finances were in a deple rable situation. and national bank currency was imminent.

It was then that Alexander Hamilton came forward with his celebrated report, afterward immortalized by the eloquence of Daniel Webster. Hamilton's statesmanship was of the highest order, but he was enamored of the British Constitution, and would have imported certain monarchical now proposed, however, to relieve the mind to a feverish state. "This measure," people of their burdens were marked by great wisdom. The funding scheme was inthe main a sound one, although some of its features were objectionable. During the Revolution the greatest difficulty Washingcould have overcome, was the want of rejected and the darling project of Hamilton encountered, and which none but he money to pay the soldiers and procure supplies for the army. Paper or Continental money was resorted to, but broke down. Certificates of debt were next given to individual creditors, with a pledge of payment as soon as the Confederation should become able to meet its obligations. But so great was the distress of the soldiers and the people generally, that they were compelled in many cases to part with these debentures for a mere tithe of their face value, often at less than ten cents on the

In reply to this animated speech, Madi son grounded himself on constitutional doctrine, and pointed out the limitations of power with which Government was clothed. Proceeding with a lucid review of the organic law, he showed that the people had not delegated to Congress the power or right to assume State liabilities. He forehas been proposed to commemorate the latter event by suitable entablatures to be erected at the Sub-Treasury which now oc-Ames called a quibble presented itself to his mind in a different light. After a searching argument upon the constitutional view of the subject, Mr. Madison next went on to speak of the injustice of the claim then before Congress. He classified claim then before Congress. He classified the States into debtor and creditor divisions, and asked whether it would be ob-Livingston waved his hand and exclaimed; the States into debtor and creditor diviserving good faith with the States them- perfectly sound, 1109 Farnham street. seives, some of which owed hardly twenty thousand dollars, while others owed several millions, to consolidate such unequal debts into a single mass and transfer the burden Republicans were formed; angry feeling of payment from those who owed the money to others who did not owe it? If the United States should assume the State debts a uniform tax would have to be laid upon the people of the Union at large, in order to raise a revenue to discharge the debt. Would not the creditor States, he inquired, regard legislation which should saddle on them the burdens of the debtor States not only as a hardship, without Constitutional warrant, but as the exercise of arbitrary and despotic power on the part of Congress?

At length Madison and Ames marshalled their forces, and the decisive test of a vote was reached. The Assumption bill was ton and Ames was slaughtered in the House of Representatives. Madison had triumphed; but Ames and the New England members, burning with rage, quit the Congress in a body, and a deadlock ensued. -[New York Star.]
