

Mischievous Malaria. To say that malaria is mischievous is to put it very mildly. It is all that and more. It is cunning, deceitful, treacherous, sly, and underhanded. It does its work in the dark, and in such a sly way that much of the mischief is done before it is discovered. It saps the foundations of a healthy system. It robs the blood of its vitality, demoralizes the liver, confounds the stomach, and makes the victim wish he were in his grave. It is sad to see people die in their misery, content to be the victims of mischievous malaria, and thinking that nothing can be done for them. The power of BROWN'S IRON BITTERS over the mischievous malaria has been so amply proved that there is no reason why anybody who can procure a bottle of this Prince of Tonics shall suffer. Great is the power of malaria, and great are its disastrous effects. But greater far is the beneficent influence of BROWN'S IRON BITTERS. The preparation of iron in this favorite family remedy can be taken without ruining the teeth or producing constipation and headache.

ALONG THE UNION PACIFIC. The Transformation of the Desert Into Foli Pledged Cities and Blooming Fields.

The Stock Raising Prophecies of Dr. Latham Fulfilled to the Letter.

The Progress of the Principal Towns and the Decay of Others--The Coal Interest--The Boom at Granger.

Correspondence of THE BEE. SALT LAKE, January 17.--A ride over a portion of the Union Pacific reveals to the "old timer" something of the progress which has been made in Wyoming the past few years. In 1867 the country west of Grand Island, Nebraska, was beyond the "farming lands," and the traveler struck out into the "Great American desert" before reaching North Platte. Cheyenne was located on the plains that year, and has grown to a beautiful city, where there are more wealthy men than any place we know of for its size. It is the cattle interest, in connection with railways, that has made Cheyenne such a pleasant place, and the same may be said of Laramie.

This reminds us of some incidents of the past. In 1869 Dr. Latham published a series of articles on stock raising on the Laramie plains. He was the first to urge that locality for that industry, and pushed his ideas so vigorously in print as to cause much comment, and he was classed as enthusiastically wild on that scheme. He demonstrated the practicability of his ideas, and succeeded in inaugurating the business of stock raising on the plains, but through side speculations, as has been the case of many, he failed financially; but his early efforts did more to cover the pastures of Wyoming with stock than those of any other man, and he deserved a better fortune than was his.

Laramie where he made his home, has changed in a few years from a small frontier town to great blocks of brick and wooden structures, with stores carrying immense stocks of goods; rolling mills which manufacture twenty tons of bolts, nuts, spikes and other railway iron per day; great shops for repairs and building of locomotives and cars, while all classes of business is transacted in the town, and a late enterprise is that of soda manufacture on a large scale.

Rawlins, once considered the most desolate place on the road, is now one with many attractions, big shops, prosperous merchants, stock men, etc. Winter is not a good season to note improvements along the line of road between Wyoming, and yet we cannot help but observe one of them. The alkali deserts of the past have become cleared of the excess of caustic soda in the soil, through increased moisture and rain-fall, and the land has been so clothed with grasses as to make a good grazing country. This one feature about the entire country lying west of the Missouri river is making the great plains the best stock and farming lands in the country, and the same beneficial climatic influences have leaped over the great ranges and are fast producing a change which will in time bring under subjection to cultivation millions of acres now considered worthless.

Then there are the changes along the Union Pacific, which can be seen at all times. I mean the new buildings, shops and other improvements, springing up all along the road. The bleak desert of the past is changing into interesting towns, fine residences, shaded walks, where reside a refined citizenship. It has been the railway, cattle interests, mining and some other industries, which conspired to make these changes, and these same interests are all in the time growing in importance, and hence the country is destined to grow in population. Wyoming to-day is the most important coal mining country west of Pennsylvania, and it ranks almost at the top in cattle raising and grazing. The Union Pacific operates twelve coal mines in Wyoming and one in Utah, which in the aggregate send out an average of 4,100 tons of coal per day. At Carbon three mines are operated, turning out 1,300 tons daily; Rock Springs, five mines, 1,500 tons; Albany, two, 800 tons; Twin Creek, two, 300 tons; and Grass Creek, Utah, one mine, 200 tons. These mines give employment to about 2,200 men. All these mines except those at Twin Creek supply the market with coal as well as supplying the road. The Union Pacific also does much in the coal business in Colorado, operating two mines at Erie, two at Canon, one at Baldwin and one at Louisville; the total daily output being about 1,300 tons. This great industry is all the time becoming greater, the demand increasing with every new settler, increase of business on the roads and extension of country supplied through opening up new lines of communication. Portions of both Idaho and Montana now draw supplies of fuel from Wyoming.

While traveling over the road we cannot help but remember the past and note with interest the changes wrought with some of the terminal towns which spring up like mushrooms and have gone down almost as suddenly. Bryan was one of the liveliest of them all. Now nothing remains but the depot and three or four empty shells, where years ago all was life and bustle. The graves of the men who died with their boots on in Bryan in its palmy days, have about disappeared as perfectly as did the town after the shops were removed to Green river.

Granger was once noted as a station on the Overland stage line, and long before the Union Pacific drove that class of transportation away, the stockade still standing was the scene of lively skirmishes with the Indians. The place now has some prospects of future greatness since the Oregon short line has made this its junction. A large depot, transfer platforms and other railway buildings have been provided.

hope to see it boom considerably in the spring. Piedmont was once full of life, and money was plenty there, the cutting of wood and lumber, and burning of charcoal giving employment to a large number of men and teams. The charcoal kilns are now idle, and the town does not present much appearance of life, but its location with great bodies of timber back of it, may again bring prosperity to the place. Hildard is another similar example of decline in the charcoal business. Seven years ago the demand kept twenty-four kilns busy, and the Hildard Flume company flourished and made good times for the entire town, then numbering over 300 persons. The company still has a good flume about thirty miles long, tapping a timber district on the lower waters of Bear river, just across the line in Utah. Wood can be floated that thirty miles at a cost of thirty or forty cents a cord, and logs and lumber in proportion. The company have good sawmills at Hildard, and several thousand cords of wood and hundreds of logs in their yards. The town is now for vacant houses and lack of business activity; but prosperity is likely to smile again on the place and reward the owners of the property now lying idle.

Evanson is a pretty place in summer, or at any time when the snow is not piled up in drifts as at present. Merchants, mechanics and others appear to be doing well, while the class of citizens and various amusements and other advantages are such as to make this place pleasant to reside in. At all locomotive stations massive engines with huge snow plows attached are ready to engage in a combat with snow drifts along the line. In early days the road had many detentions on account of snow and your correspondent was among the unfortunate who were detained by blockades on many occasions. Had the road been prepared as well in 1870-1-2 to fight snow blockades as it is now, there would not have been much detention of trains, and millions would have been saved to the company. In the line of railway improvements the progress made in machinery and appliances for raising blockades of all kinds have fully kept pace with other improvements, and the day has passed when there will ever be any prolonged blockade by snow or floods on any first-class railways. Not only have all the chances, privations and sufferings of snow blockades been removed on this great continental route, but traveling is becoming through the country at a rapid rate.

The writer of this has noted the climatic and other changes on the plains and through this great mountain region along the line of the Union Pacific, throughout Utah and Idaho, the past fifteen years, and he is of the opinion that in the next quarter of the year over the country will become productive and furnish homes for a large population. Crops of grass, grain and vegetables are now raised in localities where all was barren ten years ago, and there is large tracts of grazing lands where alkali, dust and greasewood predominated in the past.

What Three Applications Did. "I was troubled very much with sore feet. Three applications of Thomas' Electric Oil entirely cured them. Nothing better in the market." Jacob Butler, Reading, Pa.

MILLIONAIRE MACKAY. Recollections of the Time When He Traced Behind a Louisville Bar--A Favorite of Fortune.

Louisville Courier-Journal. Among the number of men who have leaped from comparative poverty and obscurity in this country in the past half century, none stand out more prominently than John W. Mackay, the California millionaire, at present living in Paris. His name is known all over the continent and the vast project of laying another cable across the Atlantic, bringing the continent into instantaneous connection with ours, with which he is so greatly identified, brings him before the people again. To those familiar with his career in the past few years, and knowing his immense wealth and splendid surroundings, it seems almost miraculous that, within the memory of comparatively young men, he was poor and obscure, without a dollar in the world. Although much has been written and said about him, as a matter of course, but few persons are acquainted with his early life, and the fact that he was at one time a resident of this city has never been made public. As a reporter was passing down Main street, yesterday, a gentleman standing at the corner of Twelfth remarked: "You see that building over there?" pointing to the house on the north-west corner of Twelfth and Main. Upon the reporter's replying in the affirmative, he continued: "I suppose it would surprise a number of persons to know that Mackay once lived there and kept a saloon. The story is not generally known, as he was not a man of wide acquaintance, and when he left the city all that of all kind cut out of those who used to take drinks from his hands across the counter, but few recognized him in his new sphere.

"Along about 1845 Mackay came to this city in company with one or two others in search of employment. He was a man, strong, active and willing to work at almost anything which would afford him a good living. An old two-story frame building stood at the corner over there, and the front room had been used as a saloon. The proprietor closed up a few months before, however, and the building was left without a tenant. Mackay had some little money, and as the location was a good one he resolved to start a bar-room there. He made a bargain with the proprietor and secured the place, opening up about a week later. The room and its fixtures would be in strong contrast with the fine saloons of the present day, with their gilded counters and fancy bars. The walls were covered with a simple coat of white paint, and the counter was a long, narrow one made out of pine boards. Behind it was a shelf on which sat some bottles and glasses. His coming was not taken much notice of, and none felt enough interest to inquire from whence he came or who he was. He was an energetic and industrious man, polite and attentive to his customers and his short figure and smiling face could be seen at all times behind the bar. He soon built up a very good trade, but he never appeared satisfied. It was evident that he was not intended for such an avocation in life, as he was restless, and like the theatre, constantly waiting for something to turn up.

"The long-looked-for day finally arrived, and he started for California, little expecting that such good fortune as fell to his lot was awaiting him. In 1849 the gold fever was at its height, and every day emigrants were leaving for the Pacific coast to reap the harvest of gold which they confidently expected was waiting for them. Mackay was one of the first persons in this city to be afflicted with the fever, and he endeavored to induce a number of friends to go with him. A party of about twenty-five was finally made up, and he was one of the leaders in it. He sold his property interests for a small sum, and that was the last heard of him until he jumped suddenly into the lap of fortune.

"I was," said the gentleman, "in California at the time of his arrival there, and watched his career with considerable interest. He had previously known Flood and O'Brien, and they were very fast friends. They were in the habit of having a saloon in San Francisco, and Mackay worked in the mines. The two famous fields of wealth then were the California and the Consolidated Virginia, and he worked in both of them. He was a very shrewd man, tolerably well educated, and had some little knowledge of civil engineering. He clearly saw that money invested in the stocks of either of these mines was sure to bring good results, and every dollar he could raise was invested in that way. At this instance Flood and O'Brien went in with him, and the three purchased stock at $3 a share. Soon after it went up to $7 and gradually increased to $18. In this simple manner their fortunes were made, and almost before they knew it they were wealthy men. Mackay then lived in a frame house on Sutter street and his figure became a familiar one to the frequenters of the mines.

"He was not married then, but met the woman who became his wife soon afterward. This in itself is a little romance and illustrates his character. She was a widow when he became acquainted with her, and was the daughter of Maj. Hurlburt, of New Orleans. She married a doctor and moved to Nevada City, where her husband died some time afterward. He was a poor man, and left his wife and child in rather destitute circumstances. Mackay heard of this some months later, and started a suit against her for the widow's benefit, contributing liberally himself, and raising a not little sum. This so touched the widow's heart that she called on him to thank him for his kindness. She was young and pretty, with a childish face and winning ways, and captured Mackay's heart completely. His courtship was a quiet one, and of short duration, and soon the pretty widow united her destiny with his. Mackay was then a rich man, but he kept widening his field of action until in connection with Flood, O'Brien and Fair he established the Nevada Bank completely. to a lady, there is the place to do it. He is all alone, and it is so dark that neither can see the other blush, and then it is so natural you ever to reap the harvest of gold which they confidently expected was waiting for them. An Ingenious Jewel Robbery. From The London Times. "Of all the tricks, devices, subterfuges, sharp dodges or deceptions I saw," said a reporter, "I never saw one so ingenious as that which a sharp fellow stole from me three pairs of diamond earrings. He evidently knew when I was not in the shop. He came in one day and said to one of my clerks, 'Is Mr. Johnson in?' 'No,' was the reply. 'I am sorry for that,' he said. 'I wish to buy a pair of diamond earrings for my wife.' This was repeated four or five successive days. The last time he said he would not wait to see me, but would look at some earrings. The clerk showed him an assortment, and he finally selected three pairs, valued at $100, and said: 'I guess I will let my wife select from these. She will be at my office in an hour, and I want you to tell Mr. Johnson to bring these around himself, as he is acquainted with my wife.' 'All right, sir, I will,' replied the clerk. 'By the way,' said the fellow, 'if you will permit me, I will write a note to Mr. Johnson.' 'Certainly,' said the clerk, as he showed him to a desk, and pointed out where he could get paper and envelopes. He took down the note, wrote a short note, folded it and put it in an envelope, and directed it to me. Then he went back to the counter and said to the clerk, 'I think you had better put the three pairs of earrings in here, so that Mr. Johnson will be sure to bring the right one.' 'Very well,' said the clerk, who handed out three pairs of earrings. The fellow dropped them in the envelope before the clerk's eyes, and was apparently about to seal the envelope when he said suddenly, 'Oh, I guess you may put that in another pair, pointing to a pair which the clerk had laid on the shelf behind him. The clerk turned and got the other pair, and handed them to the fellow, who dropped them apparently into the same envelope, sealed them up, handed them over, and said: 'Let Mr. Johnson bring the four pairs to my office as soon as he comes back,' giving the address of a well-known firm in the vicinity. Then he left, and the clerk laid the envelope on the counter until I returned. Of course we found but one pair of diamond earrings in the envelope, which was the last pair dropped in. The other three pairs were pasted about the same size. The fellow had taken two of my envelopes, and into one he had placed the three bogus pairs. When the clerk turned to get the fourth pair the fellow had put the genuine into his pocket and substituted the others. We never saw him afterward, but heard that he had practiced the same game in other places.

AN OLD TIMER. A Chat With a Pioneer Minstrel Who Has Been a Great Rover.

Detroit Free Press. Years ago, when the strictly American style of entertainment--negro minstrelsy--consisting of two end men, a middle man and four vocalists, playing an accordion, a guitar, a violin and the jaw bones, respectively, there was usually an old in which dancing, stump speeches, singing, and negro farces were the leading features. "We're Goin' to De Shuckin'," "Old Bob Ridley" and "Jump Jim Crow," were novelties in those days, and furnished a basis from which have grown all the novelties of modern minstrelsy. Among the first of the new departures was a dancing "turn," in which the minstrel with his black skin, in strong contrast with a suit of white clothes, came upon the stage carrying a broom. After dancing through several measures of his music, to which appropriate words were set and sung, he would give the chorus. "And every time he turned about, he stood just so." Suiting the action to the word, the dancer would strike statuesque attitudes, representing "Cain slaying Abel," "Ajax defying the lightning," etc. This was born the act ever since known as "Fred Wilson's Black Statue Dance," Mr. Wilson being the originator thereof.

Last evening a reporter for The Free Press strolled into the Park theatre, and at the door he was stopped by a somewhat portly man whose face showed a trifle of age-marble. From his scarf gleamed a stupendous and pure white pearl, while on his right breast was a unique emblem--a combination of a Masonic emblem and an Elk's badge. "Ticket?" asked the man.

"Where did you get the pearl?" asked the reporter.

"It was presented to me by a man who took it from the mikoko's palace at the time the palace was burned. It is valued at $2,000," Ticket, please!" "And every time he turned about he stood just so," said the reporter.

"That don't go," Ticket!" Thereupon the reporter introduced himself and asked: "Are you not Fred Wilson?" "Yes, sir; brother of George Wilson, the minstrel, and open to dance a match for $1,000 with any man of my age and weight in the world. I weigh 210 pounds and am somewhere near 55 years old."

"Where did you begin as a minstrel?" "At Boston. I was born there of English parents and in 1849 I joined a band, as we then termed it, of Ethiopian serenaders. Old Bill Nemecomb, B. G. Thayer, Charles Howard, Boston father, a big, burly, a man named Brown, who fiddled with his left hand, and myself constituted the band."

"And you have been in the business ever since?" "Not exactly, although in 1857 I played in this city with Joe Pentland's circus. In 1861, '62 and '63 I was United States marshal at Shanghai when Anson Burlingame was consul. In 1868 and '69 I was United States marshal at Hang-Kow. I was there when the French consul and fourteen sisters of Mercy were murdered by the Chinese. Just look here."

With that Mr. Wilson took from his pocket a sonnet, play his play, which sharp fellow stole from me three pairs of diamond earrings. He evidently knew when I was not in the shop. He came in one day and said to one of my clerks, 'Is Mr. Johnson in?' 'No,' was the reply. 'I am sorry for that,' he said. 'I wish to buy a pair of diamond earrings for my wife.' This was repeated four or five successive days. The last time he said he would not wait to see me, but would look at some earrings. She will be at my office in an hour, and I want you to tell Mr. Johnson to bring these around himself, as he is acquainted with my wife.' 'All right, sir, I will,' replied the clerk. 'By the way,' said the fellow, 'if you will permit me, I will write a note to Mr. Johnson.' 'Certainly,' said the clerk, as he showed him to a desk, and pointed out where he could get paper and envelopes. He took down the note, wrote a short note, folded it and put it in an envelope, and directed it to me. Then he went back to the counter and said to the clerk, 'I think you had better put the three pairs of earrings in here, so that Mr. Johnson will be sure to bring the right one.'
