Carroll's Fate Unknown-The Brutal Murder of Rose Mathews Speedily Avenged.

from Ouray says that Michael Cuddigan and wife, who so cruelly murdered little May Rose Mathews, theiradopted daughter, were last night taken from a room in Delmonico's Hotel, in which they were temporarily confined, and lynched. The work was done by an armed body of vigilantes, whose plan of operations had been so well laid out that the sheriff and his men, who were guarding the prisoners, were powerless to prevent the consummation of the crime. Third street was well filled with pedestrians at the time the vigilantes forced their way into the hotel, but the lynchers had evaded notice by stealthily creeping up the alley, which runs parallel with the main street, until the hotel was reached. Then they boldly entered the hotel.

in front of Delmonico's did not create any excitement, and it was not until after they had entered the building that, by the discharge of a pistol, the that, by the discharge of a pistol, the pedestrians in the street knew that anything unusual was going on. The shot was fired by Sheriff Rowles, who, upon the appearance of the mob, and its demand that Cuddigan and his wife be given up, ordered the vigilantes to leave the room. They refused to go, but quietly, but firmly, gave the sheriff to understand that they were determined to and under the yellow glare of the landary thing the street knew that anything a words cannot describe the scene. Imagine a words in the head of a mob of men who are actuated only by a desire to average the wrongs of a little child whom they honestly believed had met its death at her hands. They were desired to go, but a word words cannot describe the scene. Imagine a words in the head of a words cannot describe the scene. It is surprising that there was not a terrible battle at the hotel at the time of the attack by the vigilantes. Two Brothers and a brother-in-law of Mrs. Cuddigan were in the hotel, and armed with gan were in the hotel, and armed with self-acting Smith & Wesson's. The fact that they were armed would indicate that they feared an attempt would be made to tear Cuddigan and his wife from the officers and hang them. It is, therefore, somewhat remarkable that they should have disappeared on the entrance of the vigilantes. Carrol brother trance of the vigilantes. trance of the vigilantes. Carrol, brother of Mrs. Cuddigan, was in the room with his sister and brother-in-law. The vigilantes did not seem anxious to secure him, though they kept a sharp eye on him to prevent his escape. Cuddigan and his wife were the victims whom the lynchers sought. Finding that there was but little to be feared from the few people in the street without, the vigilantes proceeded to carry out their programme. Mrs. Cuddigan was the first to be taken out. She was led into the street scornely able to walk because of her awful fright, crying hysterically for help for the saints to defend her. But her captors were unmoved. "Spare me; I am innocent, God knows I am." she screamed, but the masked men who held her fast answered not a word. One would have thought they were deaf, so completely unmoved did they appear to be by her wild and pitiful cries for mercy.

VAIN APPEALS TO THE VIGILANTES.

A moment later Cuddigan and Carroll were brought out. They were but little more composed than the woman. They cursed and prayed and begged all in one breath, but all in vain. They were brought out. They were but little more composed than the woman. They cursed and prayed and begged all in ene breath, but all in vain. They were gruffly told to cease their noise, and were hurraed on. From the movement of the vigilantes after leaving the hotel it is clear that they had mapped out the minutest details of their work. They at once started toward the northern part of the city. But a few frightened pedestrians who were standing helplessly around the hotel followed. On they went, moving swiftly through the darkness, dragging their victims after them. The night was made hideous by the fearmery, which were made every now and then by the men. They begged for time, for an hour, for a half hour, to prove their innocence, but the vigilantes moved on the city, and there gave for an hour, for a half hour, to prove their innocence, but the vigilantes moved on in their inexorable purpose. The rope was made fast around his neck, and with the air echoing and re-echoing with the cries of the victim, they hanged him from the ridge pole of Uncle Tommy's cabin. He struggled violently. PRESS COMMENTS.

Denver Tribune, The facts in the Ouray lynching are simple enough. There was a pretty little girl who had a vagabond for a father, and who was put in a convent school to be brought up. Two people—a man and a woman—took the poor helpless waif from the school under a promise to take care of it, and tortured it to death by the most appalling cruelty.

In due course of time the murderers were arrested and lodged in jail. In due course of time, had there been no lynching, they would have been tried and probably escaped with a light sentence, According to Colorado precedent, neither of them would have been hung-cortainvigilantes, as in company with two of his ly not the woman. The Ouray people comrades he approached the trembling had before them the prospect of a lengthy and costly trial, which would hardly result in the punishment deserved, and they prevented the expense and disposed of the case in their own effective way.

The objection to the lynching of the woman is purely sentimental. A woman so dead to all the feelings of her sex as to torture a poor, little, unfriended child nto eternity was worse than the man. Something of softness might have been expected from her. In serving her as accomplice was served the Ouray mob displayed a strict sense of justice. Both the murderers deserved the death hey met.
