Drying out Seed Corn.

A writer in The Corn Belt thus describes his house for drying seed corn:

I have a dry house built expressly for the purpose of drying seed corn. It holds 400 bushels. The sides and ends are shelved to the joists. The shelves are three and one-half inches apart, and made of slats one-half by one inch, so that the shelves hold one tier of ears of corn, and the ears rest on the slats at tips or butts. The joists are sixteen inches apart, and the floor everhead is laid with slats, one inch by one and one-half inches apart, thus securing a free circulaion of air through the corn overhead. 1 have a large stove with a large drum in the center of the house, with pipe run ning through the house. The heat is thus distributed evenly all over the house, and is not near enough to the corn to heat it too hot. I commenced in September to save seed corn. I went to the field and husked a load of corn, and selected all the best and most perfect cars, and put them in the dry house for seed, and fed the balance to the hogs.
