A Beautiful Thought.

The weary sun was crawling

Down the West's capacious throat,

Down the West's capacious throat,
The evenine daw was falling,
Like a promissory note,
While from the thousand chambered
Mansions of the burning West
Crimson splenders swept and clambered
Up the heaven's throbbing breast, Little Peter J. McGeire

Leaned against the window bars, And watched the foaming fire, As it leaped among the stars;
Then he asked, "What is that yonder?"
"Angels, dear," his mother said—
He looked up in childish wonder;
"Are the angels' heads all red?"

The Monitour, however, is compelled to add that although he received the tonsure and the lesser orders he does not affect to hold any religious belief whatever.
