Russian movements have chiefly at tracted attention abroad, and are all held to point to a feverish desire for being on good terms with everybody. The downfall of Tchernaieff, the great leader of a vigorous and anti-English policy in Central Asia, is meant to atone for the seizure of Merv, while the state visit and the gushing speeches of the Grand Duke Michael and General Gourko at Berlin, destroy for the moment the last hope of a Russo-French combination against Germany. The czar is getting courage, has attended a big review and driven daily through the streets of his capital, while his wife dances for hours at a ball every night with the freshness of a girl, or, perhaps, the frenzy of overstrung nerves.

The strict fast of Lent has put an end for the moment to all this, and the imperial couple are expected to confine themselves during the holy season in the somber seclusion of Gatchina.

A very interesting series of statistics as to the population of France, apart from the quinquennial census, is being issued by the ministry of agriculture, the object of them being to obtain anapproximate estimate as to whether the total number of inhabitants in France will be greater or less at the close of the century than it is now. The figures so far worked out tend to prove that there is likely to be a decrease in the population, since dropped to 26 per 10,000. There is reason to believe that the rate of increase is still further declining, and that there are not upon an average more than inhabitants of Paris only 36 are born in the department, 57 coming from the provinces, and 7 from abroad.
