The California and Nevada Delegates Given a Hearty Welcome Here.

The Speeches Made, Resolutions Passed and Music Given.

The Travelers Much Gratified.

The arrival of the special train over the Union Pacific, bearing the California and Nevada delegates, was at such an early hour yesterday morning—about six o'clock—that many of the citizens, who would otherwise have been at the depot to greet them, were prevented from doing so. The party, consisting of 280 in all—ladies and gentlemen—tarried here for breakfast.

Mayor Vaughan, who is always wide awake on such occasions, had secured the Bavarian band, and in company with Judge Reed, J. J. Steadman, Spencer Smith, of the Nonpareil, and H. W. Tilton, of THE BEE, took carriages for the transfer, and there welcomed the travellers to Council Bluffs.

Mayor Vaughan was introduced by J. M. David, the Francisco agent of the Chicago & Northwestern. The mayor in a brief little speech gave hearty welcome to the party and extended to them a cordial invitation to remain over yesterday, offering to place at their disposal twenty-five carriages with which to drive about and see the many interesting features of this great railway center, and inviting them to join the decoration services.

The invitation thus cordially given could not be accepted, and the travellers expressed their regrets by the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Council Bluffs, Iowa, do hereby extend to the delegates of the California and Nevada seventy-five carriages and also hands, in behalf of the city and wide awake people, affording the delegates an opportunity of viewing the great railroad and commercial center of the west, as well as participating in the decoration ceremonies of the day, to be conducted here, and of the road, and H. G. Burt, the superintendent of the Iowa division, were here also. The train started out with Fred Paine as conductor and John Willis as engineer. It consisted of one baggage car, two day coaches, a diner, and eight sleepers, all of which were decorated beautifully.

Don't Be Afraid.
Above the noise of hurrying banks, The buzz of many a rising boom And prophecies of crazy cranks Who now predict the crack of doom, The still, small voice of Summer cries: "Do not possess your souls with fear, For primal earth and sapphire skies Proclaim that I at last am here!"

Vernal Vagaries.
The sugar flows out of the maple, The blossoms are white on the apple, The fence wears the bill of the cicada, The boys are beginning to swim; Before us the summer months gleam. To advise now do not fail, And the ball breaks the first baseman's fingers Or rips off a nail. —Pack.

A LOAF OF BREAD.
A Romantic Occurrence in a New York Restaurant.

The Brooklyn Eagle relates the following: It was high noon on Wall street, Delmonico's was filled with wealthy gentlemen in silk hats and wonderful scarfs, who were consuming chicken sandwiches with a bottle of bass. At the marble-topped tables along one side of the long room some discriminating spirits were discussing lobster salad and champagne. Before one of the choicest of these recherche lunch had been placed. He was a stout gentleman, gorgeously dressed with an air of money about him. Heavy gold seals dangled from his fop, and his finely mottled countenance showed that he lived well. He bowed loftily to all the heavy operators who passed before him, and although seemingly a stranger, was regarded with evident veneration by the young bucks from the brokers' office. He had about finished his small bottle, and was gracefully reaching for the remains of the French loaf before him when a dingy hand rudely pushed his arm aside and whisked the loaf from the table. Starting back indignantly he perceived a man hurrying toward the furthest door with a part of a French loaf conspicuously hidden beneath a shabby black coat. The stout gentleman jumped to his feet purple with rage.

"Hi, there!" he gasped; "waiter—fernal scoundrel—Ah!" concluded the stout gentleman, his ferocity giving way to satisfaction. "Get him, ah! Hold on to the villain!" and without stopping to recover breath the stout gentleman precipitated himself through an excited crowd to where the fellow, who had been intercepted and thrown down, was held to the floor by seven waiters, and a private detective had raised a cane threateningly over him. The sympathy of the stout gentleman was exuberant and the indignation against his miserable victim intense. "Hold him tight," said the stout gentleman, approvingly, as he looked upon the prostrate man. "He seems a desperate rascal."

THE WAITERS.
The thief rose painfully. He was a tall, sallow man, whose dismal features were expressive of abject despair. His dress was shabby and grimy, and his appearance seemed to indicate ill feeling and neglect. But he looked the stout gentleman full in the face when that outraged magnate burst out: "Now you insolent, audacious rascal, how dare you show me such disrespect? How dare you snatch my food, you villain! Have you anything to say why I shouldn't make a complaint against you at the police station? Officer take this man in charge. And I'm astonished officer that this man should get as far as he did, right in this restaurant in broad day. Yes, gentleman," continued the stout gentleman to the conspiring crowd, "I'm going to prosecute this fellow to the full rigor of the law. Great Gulliver! If a gentleman can't be protected at his table where can he be protected?" This announcement was received with applause. But it was checked instantly, for the prisoner began to speak. "You do not prosecute me, sir," said he, deprecatingly, "when you hear my story. I am no common thief, and though I stole your loaf, it was only that I might take it to my poor wife and little boy, who are dying of hunger. God knows," he continued, with sudden passion, "how hard this was to do."

A murmur of sympathy arose from under the splendid scarfs that surrounded the speaker, and everybody looked toward the stout gentleman. But his face exhibited only wrath and suspicion. "Fool! Fool!" said he, scornfully, "that story won't do in Wall street. I don't believe you've got a wife much less a child. Anyway, no man has a right to match a loaf of bread away from a gentleman in that fashion. It's a violation of decency, and it's given me a fit of indignation. It's infamous. Officer, take him away."

At this moment a very small but delicately dressed boy had somehow forced his way through the crowd, threw himself into the prisoner's arms with a piteous wail. "Oh, father!" he cried, and his scrawny little features were convulsed with anguish, "they ain't going to take you up! and he buried his face on the prisoner's chest and sobbed bitterly. "Gentleman," said the tall man, with a look of sorrowful reproach, "this is my little boy. I do not know how he came here, but he will confirm my story. Theodore," he continued, "how came you here?"

"Ah, sir," said the boy, "mother sent me to buy 'baccano,' she says, 'maybe he'll drown himself, for he's so desperate and we're so hungry.' And so I followed her and saw yer come'er, and come in, too."

The tall man bowed his head and two big tears made limpid runnels on his grimy cheeks. He still grasped the loaf. The tall man looked around doubtfully, but the stout gentleman waved his hand magnificently and said: "Never mind the loaf, whereupon the boy fell into it ravenously. Meanwhile, this scene had attracted the attention of everybody in the room, and it became unusually still as the man said, in a rich, resonant voice: "Hear my story before you judge me: Years ago I came to this city a poor boy; I worked hard and at last established a trade journal. In a short time I became rich—beyond the dreams of avarice. The years passed by. Thousands were looked after in my strong box, and I thought to retire from my arduous profession in comfort and peace, with a beloved family growing up around me. My mind pictured the joy of the father leading his offspring into the paths of virtue and usefulness, fond hopes of the time when my three sons would away the scepters of through the generals, dwell ever with me. But alas for the mutability of human affairs! I had a friend who was one of yourselves—a sprightly,

It will be five years ago in July that he gave me points on northwest, and, gentlemen, I did not copper that point. I bought northwest, and the stump of the market wiped out my thousands as the sickle lays low the stalks of the autumn wheat. Poor fool that I was, I tried to retrieve my losses, and my broker friend gallantly assisted me. Nothing could exceed the loyal devotion of that noble soul. He ransacked the board for inside information. He bribed the telegraph messengers. He dogged the biggest bulls and ambushed the surliest bears. But what could two do against so many?"

Through the glass doors at either end of the room came the roar and bustle of the street. But within all had grown very quiet. The stout gentleman's fine features glowed with sympathy, and the well-dressed throng sighed as they listened to the voice of this lost spirit who had crossed that Styx on the shores of which they stood. Even the spoon of the bartender ceased to agitate the delicious element of a whisky sour as he hung motionless on the clear, vibrating tones of the tall man.

"Since that time," he went on, "though ruined, I have been bound to the parlous of Wall street as the moth is to the flame. While I haunted book-shops my family were in want, my wife ill, my children ragged barbarians (here young Theodore gave a piteous howl). Yes, my poor boy, for your sire this day intended to end his life."

A low murmur of horror ran through the crowd. "On my way to the river," the tall man went on with growing excitement, "I passed this luxurious place. A demon's voice whispered: 'Why should you starve when others lunch on salad and champagne or even claret and truffles? Life bestows the right to live. Necessity is above all laws. Here a food, food, food! Draw by unyielding fate I entered, and dashed wondered through this spacious hall. Before my eyes bread appeared, crullery torn by the idle fingers of satiation, but still—bread. Appended to the bread was a man, large complacent—with gold seals—and patent leather boots—fed to fatness—owned a money king, and the tiger of fortune knawed at my vitals almost unmercifully I seized the bread and tried to escape—but I was taken, bruised, accused and I stand before you as a felon."

Bowing his head on his breast the tall man burst into tears and the boy wailed and shrieked like a prairie wolf. An uneasy sensation ran through the room, men flinched and moved restlessly. Then a clerk relieved the pent up feelings of the audience. The stout gentleman had been assisted to mount a chair and was furiously waving a gold-headed cane. "Gentlemen," he cried, "I shall not prosecute the unfortunate man and I fell twenty dollars worth of sorrow for him." This speech delivered in a bluff, hearty manner, and with a frank good nature and benevolence, was followed by the rattle of a twenty-dollar gold piece in the stout gentleman's silk hat and evoked tumultuous applause. Then with his hat inserted in his hand the stout gentleman jumped nimbly off the chair, and looking about him pleasantly, said: "Now, gentlemen, though I'm primarily responsible for this poor fellow's humiliation, I don't want to be alone in this thing, and he passed his hat winningly among those around him, his fine bearing and his cordiality. This example was infectious and clattered and fell into the hat. The stout gentleman made every donation a matter of personal honor, and his blessing, and when he handed the collection the dumbfounded recipient he had to hold the hat with both hands. "God bless you, sir and gentlemen," stammered the tall man, his sallow face beaming with joy. "This will save me—I will make me rich again." "Why," said the stout gentleman, gently, "what are you going to do with it?" "In my idle hours I have perfected a machine," said the tall man, hesitatingly, "which—"

"Go on," urged the stout gentleman. The tall man looked anxiously at the stout gentleman. He seemed to hesitate and waver and the stout gentleman watched him in grim suspense. At last a light broke over his face, and he went on with rapid enthusiasm: "A machine, gentlemen, that for four cents will make a Bengalee parasol. They can be sold at a tremendous profit for ten cents, while their lowest market price at present is a quarter. So you see the working girls of New York are practically deprived of a necessities of life. There are 40,000 working girls in New York who will buy Bengalee parasols at ten cents apiece. There is over $20,000 clear, and as sure as sunshine. This is why I say you have made my fortune."

The stout gentleman slightly winked one eye to the crowd. Then he smiled, put his finger to his forehead and shook his head. Evidently he thought trouble had lightly unsettled the tall man's brain. Then he asked kindly: "Where do you live?" "On Greenwich street" said the tall man.

"Well," said the stout gentleman, good humoredly, with a parting smile at the crowd, "I will go away with you, and taking the tall man's arm and little Theodore's hand, the stout gentleman passed out between them. About fifteen minutes after this occurrence a stout gentleman, a tall, shallow man, and small but knowing-looking boy entered an eating house on Nassau street.

"Stewed kidney and rum punch for four," ordered the tall man. "Give the boy milk liquors but no spirits," continued the stout gentleman. "Mike's too young for that yet. And now let's divide the biggest pot of the game," he continued, gleefully, "though they call those fellows sharks," and he emptied a pile of bills and coin on the table.

"That's all right," said the tall man, "but what in thunder did you want that infernal Bengalee parasol for, which I nearly forgot?" "Prudence, my accomplished friend prudence," said the stout gentleman with a queer grin. "What says old Virgil: 'Never trust the most honest pal in the world out of sight when he's got your side in his pocket.' Must have an excuse to go out with you, you know. For I'm fond of my friends, dear sir." To this conversation Mike listened intently, but he said not a word.
