TO KISLINGBURY'S RELIEF.

Surrounded by Sioux Under Yellow Eagle on the Mussleshell.

The Ill-Fated Lieutenant of the Greely Expedition Shared the Perils and Hardships of the Indian Campaign.

St. Louis Globe, July 21st.

Col. Guido Ligas, late of the United States army, is at Koester's Hotel. The colonel served many years on the plains and gained some celebrity as an Indian fighter.

In anticipation of a winter campaign of Gen. Miles against the hostile Sioux, under Sitting Bull, then posted to be encamped along Frenchman's creek...

First Lieut. Kislingbury, Eleventh infantry, whose company was at that time serving at Fort Custer, Montana, had been sent to the mouth of the Mussleshell to guard these stores.

He pitched his tent close to the river bank, and in front of a couple of shacks or log huts, inhabited by Ledy Kohla, a hunter and trapper.

The surrounding country for many miles was fat that time uninhabited. There was adjoining his location the deserted camp of a battalion of the 7th infantry which had been stationed there in the summer of 1879.

Upon arrival at the spot Lieut. Kislingbury, with rare foresight, burned and destroyed these remnants of camp-life, thinking that they might serve as a hiding-place.

He worked one whole night under the occasional fire of the enemy, leveling the pits and using the material in constructing barricades around his own small camp.

He decided that, owing to the inclemency of the weather and severity of the winter, no campaign should be undertaken until the thermometer had already gone down to 28 below zero.

He found him studying a map of Montana as he handed me the following DISPATCHES: CAMP MOUTH MUSSLEHELL, MON., November 1880—Gen. Davidson, commanding District Fort Custer, Mo: Have been attacked and am surrounded by a large number of hostile Sioux.

"No, said the colonel, at that time, the morning over a new grave and comforting his little orphan boys."

At 3 o'clock in the morning we were on the move. Troop B, Second cavalry, and companies F and I, Fifth infantry, accompanied respectively by Second Lieutenant Bretz, Lillson and Leggett, all young men of the age of 23.

Tain is no place to talk of the sufferings of the trip, but the evening of the fourth day found us at the mouth of the Mussleshell after a ride of sixty-five miles between morn and night, through deep snow and bitter cold, crossing Squaw Creek seventy-three times, and having left our wagons behind in charge of a reliable sergeant to follow by snowshoes.

I had intended to make this ride in two days, but the three young lieutenants entering my tent about 2 o'clock in the morning and urged upon me the importance of immediately relieving Kislingbury.

Of course, in my hands rested the safety and well-being of my own column. I hesitated somewhat, but the young gentlemen were so urgent and so plausible in their arguments that the stock was fresh and the men eager to go, that I soon consented and ordered the move.

Upon arrival we found Lieut. Kislingbury and party safe, but on the alert. Paddy Kohla we met several miles away from camp in a canyon. The hostiles had left on the morning following the transmission of the dispatch.

It afterwards was ascertained that the attacking Indians did not belong to Sitting Bull's outfit, but came from the Poplar river agency on a horse-stealing expedition into the Mussleshell valley.

They were Yaktonais, under the lead of "Yellow Eagle." One of them, "Big Foot" was killed by Kislingbury in the attack, and his body is still tied to a tree near the spot where he fell.
