the Method in Ir.

There is one man happy because the election is over, without reference to the result, and he is George Francis Train. During the last week of the campaign he was in mental agony. A bench in Madison Square has for years been his daily neat, bad weather accepted. In the street directly opposite the politician a erected two big stands, one for the reviewers of the great processions and the other for music on those delirious occasiona. They were the joint property of antagonistic parties, whose managers could at least agree upon that economic measure. The headquarters of both national and state committees were close by, as were the hotels in which the two presidential nominees staid while in town, so the meetings and parades were almost constant in succession, and in the afternoons, as well as evenings, Madison square was kept crowded much of the time. Train is a monomaniac, and one of his beliefs is that contact with his fellow creatures is extremely detrimental to his health, moral and physical. The prolongation of his life, he says, depends on his avoidance of the touch of human believe. ance of the touch of human beings. If an old friend greets him he responds cordially, but at the same time hastily puts his hands behind him, or thrusts them into his pockets, to save them from being grasped. When the exigences of the canvass filled the square with people his perplexity was painful, for he could hardly avoid the jostle, and to absent himself was to break one of the fixed rules of his routine. His demeanor was comical. He if fine looking, well-dressed man, with nothing in his appearance to denote eccentricity; but when he glared
