So it went. The two often got to-gether and talked an immense amount of ionsense. They even came to that dan cerous point of confession that each had been interested in the other at their first woeting. But just as the tender words of the divine passion were trembling on their lips, up came the father, like a florid Atropos, and severed their thread of happiness with the shears of prudence. Ah, why must pretty girls always have fatheral

As matters became more serious, old Loring became more severe. He guarded his daughter most jealously, and for three whole days Ned had no opportunity to speak with her, more than the little onventional talk of the dinner table. He was in despair. Billiards would not console him and juleps had lost their j charm. One fine afternoon, however, Mr. Loring was away somewhere and Ned met his beloved Hattie. A long talk and a row on the lake ensued. REPRESENTS.

a year or two. Poor Ned! She looked to see him first moment, looked as cool as a whole "Beg pardon, Hattie," said he, quite "I didn't know how far you wished to go. Of course, I was too polite to drop the affair first. People talk an, you know."

"As you are ready to quit, I'll bid you Stay-you can't refuse me this-" And pop went a little kuss, right on

As for Ned Grey, his gayety quite
