Home Again.

Robert Eason, of the firm of Paxton & Gallagher, and his wife returned to Omaha yesterday after a three months absence in England. They returned to this country on the Cunard steamer Sarvia, the trip occupying twelve days, owing to a very severe storm, in which the vessel narrowly escaped being wrecked. Among those injured was Mr. Eason, who received a sprained ankle, in consequence of which he is now confined to bed.

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY.

Some Facts and Figures With Reference to It.

The People Who Patronize it and What They Read--Valuable Additions.

The public library of Omaha is an institution of incalculable benefit to the cause of local education. It is largely patronized, and exercises an influence for good which can only be appreciated by those intimately acquainted with its inside workings.

At present it has from 12,000 to 15,000 volumes. The circulation for January 1885 was 6296, as against 5443 for January, 1884. The average daily circulation is about 229. Miss Mary P. Allan is head librarian, and is assisted by Miss McBride, in the absence of Miss Jessie Allan, now in Washington. The work is being so well conducted that it is proposed very shortly to appoint a second assistant to help in giving out books and keeping track of the routine details of the system.

New books are constantly being added to the library by purchase or contribution. It is found that the receipts in the way of fines imposed, for transgressions of rules, upon patrons of the library, are about sufficient to pay the costs of re-binding and repairing old and worn-out books. The number of books returned in a year is very large and nearly all the time there are about two hundred volumes in the hands of the binder. By the almost perfect system now in vogue, but very few books are ever lost through failure of a dishonest patron to return the volume charged against him. The "bond or guarantee card" is the main feature of the system. Each new applicant for library privileges is required to present a bond signed by some responsible friend, who guarantees the library against any loss through neglect or dishonesty on the part of the person presenting the card. In case a book is not returned, the bond is made good by the guarantor; and in event of his refusal to replace the work, the bond is placed in the hands of the city attorney for collection by law. The latter step is rarely or never necessitated.

"As for the classes of people who patronize the library," said Miss Allan, in response to the query of a Bee reporter, "there is no limit. It seems as though all kinds of people come to us. You can see that the room is nearly always full of persons who have come here either to look over the periodicals or to draw out books. At present we are crowded, but March I find without exception, is the busiest month of the year."

"How do you find the demand for heavy literature?"

"It is increasing all the time, especially among the working men--employees of the shops--who are taking very largely to reading works of a social and political nature. The demand for light literature and fiction is, of course, increasing. The boys, of course, take very naturally to such works as those of 'Oliver Optic,' 'Trotter,' 'Eggleston' and that class of literature, as well as to the Jules Verne kind. This class of literature we keep because it is interesting and generally of a moral and instructive tone. The very light and trashy shams of fiction are of course, rigidly excluded."

"Do you have much demand for standard English fiction--the works of George Eliot, Dickens, Thackeray--among those calling for books?"

"Oh, yes, a very large demand. Of Dickens' works, for instance, we have to keep duplicate sets, and they are out all the time. Do the girls take much to legitimate fiction? Yes, many of them. Dickens, for example, is devoured by many girls not yet out of their teens, not so much, I suppose, for the beauty of his diction or thought as for the general vein of the story. I find, though, that the young ladies are more particularly suited to the lighter grade of novel literature; James, and Howells, too, are becoming very popular. Such works as those of Fleming, Southworth, and that species of light and sensational novel writers are rightly excluded. No, I am sorry to say we have very little call from young ladies for solid literature, except, perhaps, for works of history in connection with their high school studies. Most of them prefer to devote themselves to light novel reading."

"Do many of the wealthy class--people who ought to own a well stocked library--patronize the library extensively?"

"Well, yes, I am continually surprised to see people coming in whom I know to be able to own a well stocked collection of books, and ask for books of the standard kind, fiction or history, which you would think they surely ought to have in their own houses, for every day reference."

"What very particularly well stocked with encyclopaedias, and we find the greatest demand for them; so much so in fact that they are in use all the time. We also are making special effort to complete our files of standard periodicals, such as the Scientific American, Harper's, The Century, Atlantic, Popular Science Monthly, North American Review, English Review, and that class of monthly magazines. We expect to soon have complete files, which, with a full index to all articles of magazine literature published, now in the library, will greatly enhance the value of the collection of works."

STANLEY HUNTLEY.

His Elevation to the Sioux Chieftanship an Absurdity and Impossibility.

An Interview With Dr. Saville, Ex-Agent of the Old Red Cloud Agency.

The statement made in the papers lately that Stanley Huntley, the humorous writer of the Brooklyn Eagle, became head chief of the Sioux nation in consequence of the death of Young Antelope, is utterly absurd and untrue, said Dr. J. J. Saville, of this city, and agent of the former Red Cloud agency, at the Pine Ridge agency before the present incumbent, Dr. McCall, during a conversation last evening.

"To any one acquainted with Indian customs, the ludicrous side of the news of Mr. Huntley's elevation is instantly apparent. It is said he was adopted by Little Knife, the hereditary chief of the nation, one of the Sioux tribes and by the death of that chief's two sons, Mountain Bull and Young Antelope--his proper name was Lamo Antelope--Huntley came next in the succession to the chieftanship of the nation.

This is impossible, for Little Knife never was anything but a subtribal chief. The last head chief of the entire Sioux nation, and recognized as such by all the tribes was Shunqua-quo qui, or known to us as Old-man-afraid-of-his-horse. He succeeded in conquering Bear, head chief of the nation, from 1850 to 1864, who was killed by government troops in the Indian war of 1864. I think Old-man-afraid-of-his-horse is alive yet, he was a about time since. Some years ago he wished to be succeeded by his son, Young-man-afraid-of-his-horse, and so he declared his intentions to the head men of the nation. Red Cloud, who was a dependent chief, went on the war path contrary to the wishes of the old man, and took with him quite a following.

Afterwards it was decided in a council attended by all the tribes, and which was held at my agency at Fort Robinson, Nebraska, that during Red Cloud's life he should act as chief of the Sioux nation, who would be chief upon Red Cloud's death. Shortly after this the general government at Washington sent out a commission to Fort Laramie, who arbitrarily declared Spotted Tail to be chief of the nation. While the Indians never recognized the right of the government to do so, Spotted Tail assumed the position, and there has been dissension among the tribes ever since. The last named chief was always looked on during his reign as an usurper, which he was.

The Sioux government may be properly called a military oligarchy. When a head chief dies it devolves on all his tribes to elect a successor to him. Generally, before the chief's death his endeavors to abdicate in favor of his son, if he has one. He uses his influence with the various tribes to this end. Councils of the warriors are held and the subject canvassed. Couriers, or runners, are sent to all the great council, where the matter is finally decided by a vote. If the son is deemed a worthy successor he is invested with his father's power, otherwise some one else is selected. The chieftaincy, while it is generally retained in a family, is by no means hereditary and the choice is always made on the direct consent of the warriors and the people.

The great requisite for the position is personal bravery and deeds of valor are earnestly prayed for or vehemently belittled in an election of chief as among us during a political campaign.

So there is no danger that Mr. Huntley will ever be called upon to govern the Sioux.

Omaha Maennerchor Anniversary.

The assembly hall of the Omaha Maennerchor, in Turner hall, was the scene of a social gathering on Thursday evening last. It meant nothing more or less than to celebrate the fourteenth anniversary of the club and members had invited their friends to help them commemorate the day, when fourteen years ago this young society was called to life. Notwithstanding the severe weather quite a number had assembled and all did their share in making the hour's pleasant. A number of songs were given and met with cheers. Refreshments were served to all who chose or had acquired the art of dancing, "sawing their partners," while the tairance was indulging in friendly conversation. Music was furnished by a piano and a vocal quartet, one of which short addresses were delivered by two gentlemen, in which they dwelt on the birth, progress and present condition of the society. After appealing to all the members for faithfulness to dear old die, an "All hail the Omaha Maennerchor" rang through the hall. The last hour was spent in dancing and singing, and songs everybody shook hands and took their departure. The writer, though comparatively a stranger, among the society, must confess to not having enjoyed such a pleasant evening for a long time and will long remember the kindness and warmth with which he was received. His wish is the future success of the Omaha Maennerchor with the finest compliments to all its members.

A Reporter's Valentine.

To-day is St. Valentine's day, and all the civilized world is now busy in sending and receiving valentines. Even a Bee reporter has been remembered, but what god, what a remembrance. After spending the night at the "Press Club" ball the reporter wearily wended his way to his daily toil. Upon standing himself at his desk the first thing that caught his eye was a dainty little envelope, the scent of which would induce that he had just been picked from a list of roses, as roses at that. Upon the envelope in a delicate feminine hand, was written the reporter's name. His hand trembled (not the effects of the bal) and his blood rushed through his veins as he nervously broke the seal. Diving down deep into the envelope, he brought forth the, as he supposed, token of love, but alas! when his optic fell upon the insidious heart, it fell like lightning, and he recoiled and for a moment he was completely dazed. The most horrible looking caricature that mortal man ever beheld. It represented a bloated, big-headed, small legged, and withal besycty looking fellow, peering through a key-hole. The verse underneath read as follows:

Of all the bold, disgusting beasts, You and your mate, are far the worst; You are a prying, lizard sneak; Of decent people here a curb; You live by lies, and slander too. Have no respect for age or youth; Invent your tales, when news are scarce; And never tell the honest truth.

Who could have done this? Who has dared to baroque the noblest profession on earth in such a ridiculous manner? The reporter, reading the above described thing, thought but the kindest of feelings for all mankind and to thus have him singled out as a target is altogether too much. Oh for a live oak club with which to kill outright the base villain who would dare to mangle the heart of a poor, innocent and guiltless reporter.

The Swain Case.

WASHINGTON, February 13.--The trial of Gen. Swain has been temporarily suspended. When the court convened this morning it met in session and the announcement that further proceedings in the case on trial yesterday were postponed until tomorrow. It is supposed the limit of the court's proceedings in secret session is to receive the findings in the original Swain case or of the Moore case. The impression prevails that one of the other cases has been referred back to the president.

PLATE, WHERE HE HAS BEEN WORKING FOR THE B. & M.

Dr. Cooke was called, and dressed Mr. Greve's wounds, he having been stabbed in five places on the arm, and the wounds were severe and very painful. It appears that Elliott, was in the saloon and wanted another drink which Greve refused him. The chap became abusive and Greve ordered him out and went around from behind the bar to enforce his order, when Elliott set upon him at once with a large open pocket knife, stabbing him as aforesaid. To-day Elliott was brought into court, and he waived an examination, and the judge, after fixing his bail at $500, committed him to jail to await the action of the grand jury. Mr. Greve, although weakened, suffering from the loss of blood, is getting along all right, but will have to wait some time before his arm will be sound again.
