Masonry Over Two Centuries Ago.

The London Freemason of November 1st says: Bro. Whytehead, in a very opportune paper, last week, calls attention to a fact, which, though for some time known to Masonic students, is hardly yet known to the majority of English Freemasons. It is the existence of an organized body of Freemasons—speculative and operative—in the seventeenth century. Dr. Plot (a non-Mason) first called attention to the fact itself, and the publication of Handle Holme's works, and "Ashmole's Dairy," confirmed the assertion of one who (by the way) does not appear to have been slurred over, if not iggored and forgotten, by our Masonic historians. Anderson, in 1723, for some reason or other (perhaps explicable,) does not mention the matter; though, in 1738, he glances at it in the extracts from "Ashmole's Dairy," Dr. Plot's remarks, and the seventeenth century connection with Freemasonry of Inigo Jones, Sir Christopher Wren and the Duke of Richmond. Until quite recently, our best writers passed the seventeenth century history over, as, perhaps, a subject somewhat difficult to explain, though in the British museum more than one seventeenth century guild legend remained, as if reproduced then to meet a want, to satisfy a demand. And yet nothing seems now to be more clear than that from 1646 (certainly) an English Masonic body existed akin to our own in this important fact, that non-operatives were members of the lodges. It is not too much to say that Masonic life was going on at Warrington in 1546; York, 1663; Chester, 1670, at any rate; London, 1682; Staffordshire, 1686 (and there and elsewhere much earlier), if Dr. Plot be correct, and again at York about 1690. If the Swalwell lodge traditions are correct, that lodge was in existence in the seventeenth century, and we have no doubt, as time runs on, these evidences will be multiplied. The importance of Brother Whytehead' spaper, then, amounts to this—that in the theory of Masonic history being continuous, which the nineteenth century proclaims, he supplies another goodly link in that happy chain of undoubted and authentic facts, which is now irresistible, and which, after long years of forgetfulness and desquietude, is lengthening, hour by hour. We cannot expect full light all at once, but let us hail the twilight (keeping clear of moonshine, however), and seek to hasten the dawn of a clearer atmosphere.

At the installation of Doric lodge, No. 216, C. M. Chase, P. M., was the recipient of an elegant jewel, inlaid with diamonds, at the hands of his brethren. Moritz Kolmuk, the oldest P. M. of Doric, presented the same, on behalf of the membership, in fitting terms, and the response of the recipient evidenced his appreciation of the beautiful testimonials. A banquet concluded the interesting meeting.

DURKEE'S SALAD DRESSING & COLD MEAT SAUCE for all kinds of salads, fish, vegetables and cold meats. Cheaper and better than home-made. No sauce equal to it was ever offered.

A juror at Cumberland, Md., the other day, hung his coat over one of the heaters in the court room. When he put it on after adjournment he found that some apples he had in his pockets were roasted.

While praying during a storm, says the Natchez (Miss.) Daily Democrat, old Katie Hightower, who has been blind for fifteen years, had her sight suddenly restored, and can now see as well as when a child.
