The wintry winds, acting upon the exposed pipes, induce a certain congelation of the gas which totally destroys its illuminating qualities. The main piping, however, has been but little affected. It is found that the greatest danger from a "freezing up" is not at the time after, when the thaw has commenced. The fact has not yet been explained in a manner entirely satisfactorily. It is bemore tare than the Florida fruit, and to lieved, however, that when a thaw takes soil is driven deeper downwards, re-acting directly upon the water or gas-pipes. Only after the thaw above grownd has completed its work, is the sub-surface soil so thoroughly "rotted" as to be driven out of the soil.
