GERMINAL, Or, the Story of a Great Miners' Strike. BY EMILE ZOLA.

Summary of preceding chapters. A young mechanic out of work, reaches the coal mines of Monston, France, cold, hungry and penniless.

The next day and the days following Anton resumed his labors at the mine. He became accustomed to the work and the new habits, which had seemed so hard to him at first.

The days followed each other, weeks, months glided by. Now, like his comrades, he rose at three o'clock, drank his coffee and went off, carrying his slice of bread and butter.

Then came the walk in bare feet, through the chilling air, to the superintendent's office. His attention was no longer attracted by the engine, shining out in the darkness with its copper and steel.

He had never thought such a fall possible, but he knew more and more acutely, that to descend in the darkness under a beating shower.

Every evening about nine o'clock, when the saloon was empty, Anton remained there to talk to Jo Jouvarne.

"Do you know," said Anton one evening, "I've received another letter from Pluchart."

For two months Anton had been carrying on a regular correspondence with the machinist at Lille, whom he had at first informed of his engagement at Monston.

"What do you think of the idea?" said Rasseigneur to Jouvarne.

But Anton grew angry. He wished to form a branch of the International Association of Workmen, that famous "International" in London.

"I've talked that matter all over. Your Karl Marx is willing that this matter should govern itself and the only concerted effort should be to increase the wages of workmen."

Anton commenced laughing. He did not always listen to the words of his comrades. This thing of distraction seemed to him futile, but for a moment more practical, and with the knowledge of an experienced man, did not even descend to become angry.

"Then you're going to attempt to form a branch in Monston, are you?" said Pluchart.

strongly with the more somber hue of the beet fields. It was one boundless waving sea, whose billows seemed to increase each evening with the growth of vegetation.

Anton had given all nature a new life. Now, as Anton looked forth in the evening, it was no longer the old ruins that he surprised the lovers.

"No, thank you, nothing at all." Anton had become acquainted with Jouvarne; he lived in the same house. He was a machinist at the Vulture, who occupied the room next to his.

The first week, Anton had found him reserved, almost fierce. He did not know his history until later.

time to think of all this. I'm ready, if the others are." There was a silence. The oil lamp on the box was smoking.

"Everything is so dear," replied Madame Rasseigneur, who had entered and was listening with a gloomy air, so stately and dignified, that it was almost unbelievable that she had paid twenty-two sous for eggs.

"This time the three men were of the same mind. They spoke one after the other, in a whispering low voice, complaints fell fast.

"This must end," repeated Madame Rasseigneur, energetically.

Jouvarne was stroking Pologne's ears, whose nose was curled up with pleasure. He said in a low voice, with eyes lost in the distance, as if speaking to himself:

"Increase the salaries. Why they are fixed by an inexorable law at the smallest price of coal, to pay it by the ton, the workmen to eat dry bread.

Every evening there was some such conversation in the bar-room, over the cup which it took Anton an hour to empty.

It was toward the middle of July that Anton began the study of this subject. He was in the saloon, waiting for an accident; the workmen in the vein William came upon a strange sight in the bed, which indicated the presence of a dyke, and, in fact, they soon encountered a flow of blood.

One day, on leaving the mine, Mahon led Anton aside and offered to employ him as a miner in place of Levaigue, who had left.

Anton began to read the placard. The drafts for employment were found to be in the vein of the mine, but in the vein of the mine, but in the vein of the mine.

A RATTLESNAKE HUNTER. The Demand that is Supplied by a Queer Mountaineer.

Pittsburgh Dispatch. A rather tall and decidedly thin man, with a prominent hooked nose and a complexion like that of a cigar-store Indian, walked nervously up and down the Union depot platform last night as he waited for a train east.

"Do you deal in snakes?" asked the reporter. "Only in rattlesnakes," he replied. "I have been engaged in catching and selling them for the past twelve or fifteen years."

"Where do you get them?" "Well, I sell numbers of them to this man Kobbie, who sends them to Germany and other European countries, where they are kept in glass cages as a saloon attraction, as game pieces, and for medicinal purposes."

"How do you catch them?" "Oh, there are a number of ways. The most common is to take up a fence post, and then to take up a snake, and then to take up a snake, and then to take up a snake."
