EVACUATION OF RICHMOND.

How Jefferson Davis Received the News of Lee's Surrender. Women's Lot in War—Virginia Society in War Times—Scenes in a Troubled Era.

How well I remember, writes M. E. G. in the Philadelphia Times, dear old St. Paul's church on that second day of April, the beloved pastor, so earnest and so interesting the dim, salted light, falling upon the upturned faces, so many men of note. Mr. Davis sat at the foot of his family pew alone, as he had several weeks before sent Mrs. Davis and the household further south, believing that they would be safer there if the army should fall back from around Richmond. Our pew was somewhat behind him, and I saw only the light erect figure and the reverend bend of his gray head. During a pause in the service the sexton walked rapidly up the aisle and gave Mr. Davis a paper. He was seated at the time. He read it at a glance, and the hand which held it fell to his side. He sat perfectly motionless for a perceptible space of time, and then rose slowly, and as one who had received a frightful blow. He reached for his soft, broad-brimmed hat, and stepping into the aisle, he turned his face to the door, and with slow and reverent steps departed. He went out as one might leave the chamber of the dead.

It was the custom at that time for many of the young people leaving church to walk up to the end of Grace street, on which St. Paul's was situated, and to walk down again by way of Franklin street, then as now the most fashionable street in the city. So as my companion and I left the church we walked up Grace street, and as we passed the door, a considerable number, many of whom we knew, hastening in the opposite direction. Some called out, "Have you heard that Richmond is to be evacuated?" I replied that I had been through a "Pavnee Sunday" and knew all about panics. All the way up the street the same news was being repeated, and the crowd became more and more excited. We crossed over into Franklin street and the crowd became denser, and by the time we reached my father's house, the news was being repeated in every direction.

STORIES FOR THE DRINKS.

Four of a Kind, and Mighty Good Ones they Are. A Railroad Narrative—The Clara Morris Trip—A Funeral in a Railroad Car.

The night of the full moon and starlight, and the snow is frozen to the ground so that even a gum shoe on a one-legged man makes a singing noise as he trudges on. Long after the respectable element has gone home and is asleep the city is full of wayfarers men looking for a shelter, or a steam coil, or a hot stove or a cheerful man behind the bar. These wayfarers who hide by day or, if seen, dodge busy people like a whipped dog, become communicative at dark and use every device to entertain the man who is likely to "set 'em up." It is singular how they keep posted on the events of the day. That is necessary in their business. "Xaminer only twenty dollars a copy, latest edition; last one!" The twenty dollars was paid, the paper secured and doubtless my friend would show it to you to-day should you care to see it.

How the city was fired we never thought of inquiring then, so natural did it seem to us that flames and horror should surround the other parts of the city. It was just on the edge of the burnt district. It was just on the edge of the burnt district. It was just on the edge of the burnt district. It was just on the edge of the burnt district. It was just on the edge of the burnt district.
