Stock Yard Items.

A load of dead hogs that were smothered at Cortlandt, during the recent storm, have been consigned to the yards.

Some very fine ice is being cut on "the lake" at the yards.

A party of live stock men arranged to take part in the sleighing carnival. Mr. Tubbs was followed by W. F. Brown and Frank Yates. John Doe was to be stationed in the rear to pick up the dead and cripples. Through some misunderstanding as to time, they were not present.

THE PLUMBER'S SAY.

Their Wealth More Imaginary Than Real and Their Bills Not Exorbitant.

Pittsburg Chronicle: "Look here! Why don't you newspaper fellows give the plumbers a rest, and turn the battle of your feeble, worn-out jokes on some other class of tradesmen for a season?"

The man who fired off this question was a "jour" plumber, on his knees at a sink in the corner of a dark kitchen, with a smudge of black across his face and surrounded by the tools and implements of his profession, engaged in chipping away the ice preparatory to cobbling up a burst water pipe. He was invited to enlarge further on the grievance of his guild against the enemies of civilization and progress, the free and enlightened press, and proceeded:

"Base ball, mule, mother-in-law, and other stock subjects for journalistic quibs and cranks and alleged jokes; but we poor devils catch it all the year round—'all times and seasons are thine,' O plumber! In winter the plumber is laying up boodle to build him a palace or take him to Europe to marry his daughter or son to a title where wealth is a consideration greater than birth; in summer the plumber is said to be astonishing everybody by his lavish display of wealth at the seaside, mountain and like resorts. The plumber's bills are likened to eternity, because they are without end. We catch it in prose, and are lashed to madness in doggerel in its most awful forms. This has been going on for years, and, now that they have got to putting plumber jokes into medical almanacs, I think the what-d'ye-call-'ems, the paragraphers of the newspapers, ought to give us a rest.

"No other set of artisans are called upon to do such dirty and disagreeable work as are the plumbers, and we frequently run as much risk to life and limb as do any other class of workmen. Outside the fitting up of new buildings, there is very little of what can be called agreeable work in our business. All repairing is more or less filthy, and some of it is perfectly awful, and the charges ought to be much higher than they are. In putting in hydrants we have to work in the mud and water, and so we do also in opening up old or putting in new pipe sewers or connections. And we are exposed a great deal to the weather, and suffer as much from cold as any one. Just look at me. I had my cheeks, nose and ears frost-bitten while doing repairs during the recent cold weather, and the whole job, which took me more than half a day, only came to $2.75. Do you consider that an exorbitant price with all those frost-bites thrown in? I don't. The fact is, plumbers' charges are not as a rule unreasonable when you come to investigate them. Time is the chief element in nearly all our charges. For instance, your hydrant needs a washer. Instead of getting a piece of leather, cutting a washer and putting it in yourself, you say you haven't time and stop at my shop and leave word for me to do it. That means a walk of several squares going and returning, to do ten minutes' work. I charge you 25 cents, and you think it outrageously high just for putting in a bit of leather. But when you count up all the time consumed the charge is not high. The same thing is true in a great measure of nearly all small jobs. We have to go about lugging great loads of tools and solder and lead pipe and other materials, and are entitled to pay for doing it. It is a part of our business, and not a pleasant part either. Don't you fear, I'm not going to charge up in your bill for fixing this pipe the time I've used up in talking to you. But I wanted to put in my protest against the newspapers making the plumbers the butts for all their chestnuts."
