

A PRISON REVELATION. "No. 177" Makes Startling and Mysterious Statements to Secure His Liberty. CHARGED WITH DISHONESTY.

Something Very Queer About Street Contractor Hoel's Accounts - Wonders of Wyoming - Police Court News - Odds and Ends.

Quite often it occurs that a man, after being convicted of murder or some lesser offense, makes a confession of his crime and thus secures the satisfaction of having made a "clean breast of it" before entering upon the expiration of his evil doing.

In 1882, Duncan who was at that time a horse-trader and a man-of-all-business, living in that unsavory locality known as the bottoms, was arrested for committing the crime of rape upon his own daughter, a little fifteen year old girl.

Whether Duncan is a wronged man or a scoundrel is not given up all hope of release. In the letter written to Detective Emery, as already intimated, Convict 177 begs him to secure him a new trial, or in some way to secure his freedom.

Duncan says that in July or August, 1881, two men, supposed to be hunters or trappers, came down the Missouri river in a large two oared sailboat, having on board a load of dried meat.

He found that some two or three weeks after these two men had gone up the river, two more men in a large boat had found the same boat and cooking outfit that the hunters had brought down with them.

Additional confirmation of Duncan's story lies in the fact that two hunters, answering his description, did disappear from Deadwood, as already mentioned, in the summer of 1881.

replacing it anew it would last five more. But the pavements, lasting ten years, would cost as much as one pavement of granite, which would last 100 years, I suppose.

Another thing. This replacement would necessitate tearing up the street the second time. Now if the people prefer to pay as much for a pavement of ten years durability as they would be charged for a pavement lasting say 100 years, the responsibility of the choice must rest with them.
