New York Sun: The din and roar and crash of battle was about me. Stonewall Jackson had come through Brown's Gap from the Shenandoah valley, and the blow prepared for McClellan had been struck at Gaines' Mill. It was the first fight my regiment had participated in. We were posted near the foot of a wooded slope, having a slight breastwork of logs and limbs in front of us, and for half an hour we had nothing to do but listen to the horrible din. Pretty soon the smoke drove down until we could see neither to the right nor left, but there was a pretty fair view directly in our front.

I remember as if it were but vesterday Most of us were boys, and while we tried to be stout-hearted our faces grew white, and fear kept up a constant struggle with pride. Below us ran a bush-fringed creek; beyond that was clear ground for twenty rods; then came the heavy forest in which the confederates were massing to hurl themselves against our particular position. Above us, further up the hill. our cannons were throwing shot and shell into the wood with awful crash, and to the right and left we could hear the fierce cheers of charging men. It was awful to die in peace amid such excitement, but our turn came. A cheer which for a moment rose above all other sounds came from the woods in front. Then a line of battle with regimental front broke cover at double quick. It was followed by another and another. until the space between the creek and the forest was filled with advancing men. Now the artillery above us redoubled its fire, and the scream of grape and canis ter over our heads was terrifying. I could not hear any of the orders given by the officers, but as the men on either side of me began firing, I followed suit. Seven out e^T every ten of our bullets must have killed or wounded, fired into such a solid mass. The first line melted away before it reached the creek. The nd fared but little better, but on came a third and fourth and fifth, cheering and firing, and while I was loading for th fifth time I saw confederates forming on our side of the creek for a dash at our works. The artillery could not be de-pressed to reach them, and our musketry fire had slackened off somewhat. The line of gray charged up the hill, and right in front of me I saw a fair faced lad of 17 or 18. His blue eyes were flashing; his teeth hard shut; his face as white as death. The line halted on the other side of our breastwork, and now men fired into each other's faces. I levelled my musket full at the breast of the fair faced boy. He was so near that his eyes looked into mine, and his musket was unloaded. There was an appeal for mercy in his eyes as they first met mine but a second later there came a look of proud defiance, and he clubbed his musket and struck at me across the logs. He stood almost alone. It seemed like murder to fire on him, but war is murder. The powder flame jumped into his face as I pulled the trigger, and then our lines rose up and cheered again and again. We had driven the gray lines back. I did not cheer. I felt the guilt of a murderer. In some Georgia home a mother would sob and weep, a father would curse me, brothers and sisters would grieve and refuse to be comforted. Other men looked over the breastworks and cheered again. My victim was there; I dared not look.

Our position was too strong to be carried, but we were flanked on the right and left and compelled to fall back, and the first of McClellan's defeats had been

We had retreated mile by mile to Malvern Hill. Here we were to make a last stand against the legions in gray, which had exultingly followed us through the swamps and over the hills. The great plateau bristled with cannon, and was covered with lines of infantry. On the slopes were other lines. Along the base, making rifle pits on the banks of the meandering creek, were the men who were to feel the first shock of battle. For two or three hours the ground trembted under the terrifle fire of the artillery. Then Magruder's men broke cover from the pine woods and swarmed across the cleared fields of the Crews turm. Every gun on the plateau belched shot and shell; every musket along the creek sent its bullet into the charging ranks. We broke them again and again, but again and again, they reformed, and dashed forward to grapple with death, In the last desperate charge, made just as the sun was hanging on the tree tops, the first lines almost reached the creek We had fired our sixty rounds and been served anew, and more than once our muskets had been laid in the shallow riv-ulet to cool off. Desperate as had been the charges, reckless as the gray legions were, none of them had passed the creek Shot and shell and bullet had met them on the open meadow and rent and shattered their columns.

This would be the last charge. We all realized it as we made ready to repulse it. With cheers that told of brave hearts they came on, and in a moment the clouds of smoke shut the heads of col-umns from view. I had fired four or five times, when a column of gray suddenly times, when a common gray suddenly appeared close upon us and gave us a volley. Right in front of me—a wraith rising out of a deep sea fog—I saw the fair faced lad of Gaines' Mill. His blue eyes blazed again, his white teeth showed between his lips, his breath came hard and fast. I was down on one knee, my musket covering him. As he looked into my face I saw that he recognized me. Aye, he seemed to reproach me. But I was there to main and kill. What were the sobs, and tears and heartaches in a home to me? It is a soldier duty to desolate family hearthstones—to make mothers, and wives and sisters weep. I was but a boy, however, and I had the heart of a boy. I shut my eyes as I pulled trigger, and fearing to see him lying there with a ragged wound in his breast as the cloud of snoke lifted. I ran up the line thirty feet and crowded We had checked the exultant foe who

We had checked the exultant foe who had dogged us so many weary miles, and our army was saved. I tried to cheer with the rest, but my voice would not come. The boy whom I thought I had murdered at Gaines' mill had no raculously escaped my bullet, but this time I must have killed him, and the thought was a drowned rats.

great weight on my heart. He was lying there in the gathering darkness, his blood pouring out on the great blood pouring out on the green grass, and his death glazed eyes staring up at the stars. I could not cheer. I felt more like weeping.

I was sick in hospital when Jackson and Longstreet drove Pope over the plains of Manassas back upon Washington, but when McClellan faced Lee at Antietam I was again in the ranks. Hooker had been fighting on the right for an hour when our division moved in to support his beaten troops. The dead and wounded were thickly strewn over the ground that morning. Jackson's left was covering a ford, and his left spun out to connect with Lee, but we could not break him. The Dunker church was just in front of us, and about 10 o'clock we got the order to advance. We had to clear a standing fence, push across an open field, and then meet another fence which the confederates were using for cover. How the shell dropped among us! How grape and canister mowed our ranks! How the bullets flew about our cars! I wondered how we could be so steady under that murderous fire. I wondered if our advance was supported, and how many of us could cross the field and

It was a nightmare. There was no cessation of the terrible clash and din, and the smoke was so thick that we ran into the fence before seeing it. We dropped down and began firing, hoping for the lines of support to come up, but through some blunder we were left to fight it out alone. Then there suddenly occurred a breathing spell. As if by mu-tual consent the firing almost ceased, and as the smoke lifted the confederates made a charge. Perhaps we were ordered to retreat. I heard no command. It seemed certain death to leave the cover of the fence, slight as it was. I supposed our policy would be to break the charge by a rapid tire, and I was loading and firing as fast as possible when their first line thirty feet long rose up and fired into their faces and then used the bayonet to keep them off. They gave back, couraged by their officers they came again. Right in front of me, bareheaded with curls of powder smoke floating through his flaxen locks with the same old fire of battle in his eyes, was the boy whom I thought I had left dead at Mal vern Hill. There was a freshly healed scar on his left cheek. I noted it as we looked into each other's eyes across the fence, our muskets unloaded, our bayonets broken. He knew me on the instant. It was his turn now, but there was no thirst for vengeance in his look. I had wounded him twice, but he bore me no malice. There was firing on the right and left, and my comrades were using their clubbed mus-kets. The boy called upon me to surrender, but the spirit of a devil reminded me that I had a revolver in my belt. I reached for it, aimed full at the boy's head, and as I fired he threw up his hands and sank down. I tried to cheer, but my voice accused me of foul murder. As retreated back, a thousand missiles of war rending the air and ploughing the ground, I felt the touch of a hot iron on my shoulder and fell among the dead and wounded. It was night when they car-ried me away to the field hospital. When the troops of Hooker debouched into the wilderness at Chancellorsville I was with them, sound and well again. All day long Jackson had been stealing along our flank to take the army in th rear, but we did not suspect it, We had turned Lee's position at Fredericksburg, and he must come out and fight us on the Salem hills. Hooker could select his own battle ground, and victory must surely perch upon his banners. As dark-ness fell and our camp fires blazed in the Virginia thickets we were enthusiastic.

With no more warning than a tiger gives as he springs upon his prey, Jack-son struck us. Hundreds of the panic-stricken men fled to the rear; a few ral-lied behind the fallen trees in hopes to check the rolling waves until reinforcements could be sent up. It was the effort of a human hand to stop the fly-wheel of a great engine. In five minutes we were being trodden into the earth. A sort of desperation seemed to seize us. We would not retreat and we would not sur sender. Like one rising slowly from the ground, the boy of Gaines' Mill suddenly confronted me. We recognized each other at once. Thrice had I wrought for his death and thrice had he recovered. He was pale-faced and seemed weak. I must have wounded him in the head at Artietam, and perhaps he had only left the hospital to help beat Hooker back. "Surrender! Surrender!" they shouted.

"For God's sake, surrender!" cried the boy, as he lowered his musket.
I would not. The spirit of seven devits raged within me. I had a load in my musket, and I fired it; felt a great pain in my side; fell to the earth and and slept. I dreamed and raved and called slept. I dreamed and rayed and called out in my terrible thirst, but when morning came I was calmer. The dead and dying were on every hand. I sat up. Beside me was a corpse in gray. I looked down upon the cold, dead face, and I knew it in an instant. This was the body of the boy of Gaines' Mill—of Malvern Hill—of Antietam. I had murdered him at last. He had been shot through the lnngs. There was blood on his chest and lips, on the ground. He had not died at once. It was the water from his canteen which had quenched my thirst. It was his hand which had placed a blanket under my head.

OR SKIN CANCER.

For soven years i suffered with a cancer on my face. Right months ago a friend recommended the use of Swift's Specific and I determined to make an effort to secure it. In this I was successful, and began its use. The influence of the medicine at first was to somewhat aggravate the sore; but soon the inflamation was allayed and I began to improve after the first few bottles. My general health has greatly improved. I am stronger, and able to do any kind of work. The cancer on my face began to decrease and the ulcer to heel, until there is not a vestige of it left—only a little scar marks the place.

I have had a cancer on my face for some

I have had a cancer on my face for some years, extending from one cheek bone across the nose to the other. It has given me a great deal of pain, at times burning and itching to such an extent that it was almost unbearable. I commenced using Swift's Specific in May, 1835, and have used eight bottles. It has given the greatest relief by removing the inflamation and restoring my general health. W. Barnes.
