The Adams-Coleridge Case.

Copyright 1886 by James Gordon Bennett. LONDON, Nov. 22.—[New York Herald Cable—Special to the BE.]—I have been told by a venerable queen's counsel that to-day yielded legal incidents unprecedented in English history.

The plaintiff complains that certain letters and documents were libelous. These, before he brought the suit and published them in the whole world, were sent to him and the Coleridge's father and son and to two solicitors. The lord chief justice testified that he left these alleged libels with his solicitor as privileged documents.
