THE WEER IN WALL STREET. the Europeon Situation Guides

Affairs on the Stock Exchange. NEW YORK, Feb. 5 - Special Telegram to the BEE -The European situation, with its rapidly varying phases, had the guidance of affairs at the stock exchange during the greater part of the week. True, other causes were at work, notably the labor troubles, which, however, lost much of their Interest and influence as time were on, but the series of panies in London and on the continent growing out of the war seare formed the main factor. Even at the height of the excitement none of the foreign bankers here who conduct arbitrage dealings believed that war would really ensue unless some of the leaders of the military party should precipitate it by the commission of a rash overt act, and all attributed the unsettled state of political affairs to the efforts of Bismarck to win at the forthcoming elections. As the week advanced the fact was developed that speculation had much to do with panies, and that a strong bear party was operating both at Berlin and Paris, who strained to the utmost every utterance of Bismarck and Boulanger to further their objects. They succeeded in bringing about enormous the continent poured these out in London, liquidations for bull account in true that he fretted in the position he all classes of stocks, and as then held on General Halleck's staff. that center sought New York as an outlet for Americans, which produced a marked effect on prices here at intervals. It was a noticeable feature, however, that after the first panic early in the week the effect of each subequent one grew less and less upon the New ork market, not with standing the knowledge that the German elections do not take place until the latter part of the month, which of sourse offers an opportunity for a constant repetition of the war scares. This decreasing mpression here was the result of an increased disposition to buy stocks on all reactions caused by London selling, which grew out of the belief that liquidations in Americans on the other side were practically over, and that some of the more recent sales were for short account. All things considered, fluctuations on leading shares, while frequent, were not nearly so wide as might have been expected under the circumstances, the changes generally having been compassed within a range of 1 to 1½ points. New England was a marked exception and rose over 6 points, carrying the general market up after it in later dealings. In the rally which followed Friday's recovery at London some stocks recorded the highest figures of the week, and a number of others almost entirely on leading shares, while frequent, were not week, and a number of others almost entirely recovered the early decline. With numerous changes in the stock market it was not surprising that railroad bonds of a speculative class vibrated frequently. As a general thing lower prices were touched, the decline at bottom figures have been equal to 1 to 5 points. Texas Pacine suffered more because of the contentle n between the reorganization committee and the income bondholders. Erie 2ds, Wabash (Chicago division), St. Louis, Arkansas & Texas 2ds, Denver 4s, Chesaceake & Ohio class B, and currency 6s, Mexican National 1sts, and Kansas & Texas generals were also conspictions for weakness. Later on there was an advance of 14 to 314 points, the latter in New York City and Northern 1sts, which were active on the rumored reopening of negotiations for the settlement of differences with the New York market was a little easier. The monetary situation was characterized by ease, and borrowers on call bad no difficulty in supplying requirements at 3½ and 4½ per cent, with exceptions at still lower figures. ## GENERAL PHIL SHERIDAN,

How He Got an Opportunity to Win a Name for Himself.

FROM A CAPTAIN TO A COLONEL

The Story of His Appointment and How He Received It-General Gordon Granger's Good Work.

Successful men's lives-writes Colonel Frank Burr, in the Philadelphia Timesare full of accidents. General Philip H. Sheridan got his first opportunity to win fame by chance. When the civil war was more than a year old he was an is suer of rations with only the rank of cap tain. Had not General Grant been relieved of the command of his army after the battle of Shiloh, Sheridan would probably never have left the commissary department to lead men to battle. It is then held on General Halleck's staff. He had done the best he could to secure the colonelcy of some regiment from his native state; but he was then without fame or influence. He had been sent to West Point practically by a political accident, and his family, who lived down n the little Onio village some few miles below Newark, had no means of imprassing themselves upon the governor, Each new regiment that was called out had a dozen aspirants for the colonelcy, with social and political power to throw into the scale to help their ambitions.

This was a potent power as against a pure military training. So Sheridan's weeks of application lengthened into months and months into a second year, and yet he found no employment for his military genius higher than looking after the rough provender which the govern-ment provided for its soldiers. When his new life and opportunities dawned upon him he was still a member of Gen-eral Halleck's staff. His place thereon was not a large one either. But he made the best there was of it.

The 25th of May, 1862, came, finding that this old lawyer general, full of cranks and prejudices, had virtually dug his way during six weeks of inactivity from the fateful field of Shiloh to within gunshot of the confederate outposts at Corinth. Each succeeding mile, from the day when Halleck had relieved Grant, a new line of earthworks was thrown up ir an over-cautious advance. Graves of brave men dotted the hillsides and vallevs. They numbered in the aggregate more souls than would have been lost in open combat with the confederate army. for it was only half the size of that which Halleck had gathered to play with upon twenty miles of entrenchments-from the point where he relieved General Grant of command to the confederate outposts at the railroad centre, which Beauregard evacuated when Halleck came too near,

Just after the battle of Shiloh Pope's army, which had been operating on the Mississippi below Island Number Ten, was brought up to swell Halleck's forces. Among these troops was the Second Michigan Cavalry and with the other troops it fretted and grew half demoral-ized with the slow and uncertain policy which characterized Halleck's operations after the frightful wrestle on the banks of the Tennessee. Its colonel, Gordon Granger, was made a brigadier general about this time. He was a regular army officer, who had been promoted from a captaincy to its command while it was stationed in St. Louis. His discipline with difficulty he was seen from one end was severe, but it made the regiment effi-

His promotion left it in a condition to be very soon demoralized. During the few weeks which clapsed before a new colonel was found the regiment drifted under the command of a lieutenant colonel into that feeling of uncertainty which is detrimental to any military organization. As it lay one evening in the latter part of May within cannon-shot of the village of Corinth its future was a question of a strong hand and a new

On one of those hazy, depressing summer days so common in that southern climate Captain Russell A Alger, of Company C, Second Michigan cavalry, was acting field officer of the day. He always took an active interest in the regiment's welfare. Frequently with the other officers had he discussed, without solution, the problem of finding a new colonel for a command, the record of which was and is second to none in the army. Austin Blair was at that time governor of Michigan and at the moment of which I am writing was visiting the army. He was to return home the very morning when the accident securred which gave him an opportunity to do a meritorious act and endow with new force the cavalry regiment from his state, in which he had an unusual in-

Captain Alger had been on picket duty all night of the 24th of May, and early on the morning of the 25th reported to General Gordon Granger upon some matters of detail, which was his duty as acting field officer of the day in front of an enemy. After the business of the moment was over the condition of the Second Michigan cavalty became the subject of discussion. General Granger, who still took an interest in its welfare, had been casting about for some regular army officer who would be his fit suc-cessor at the head of this splendid regiment. He had been over to Halleck's headquarters the day before Captain Alger's visit and had met Sheridan. This morning as he and Alger talked, he

"I have found a man who will make your regiment a good colonel."
"Who is it?" asked Alger, earnestly.
"Captain Phil Sheridan, of the Thirteenth infantry, 'replied Granger. 'He is now over at Halleck's headquarters, acting as a commissary on his staff A shade of inquiry passed over General Granger's countenance as he said:

"He is just the man you want, but I doubt whether Governor Blair will commission another regular army officer to command a Michigan regiment. He thinks that we are too severe in our discipline and that the troops do not like

Captain Alger replied that the regiment needed a commander of character and decision, and that he believed Blair would do any reasonable thing for the welfare of the troops from his state.

"Very well," replied General Granger, "I will give you a letter to him, asking Sheridan's appointment. He is now at Pittsourg Landing, and leaves this afternoon for the north, at 2 o'clock, by the

It was now breakfast time. Governor Blair was nearly thirty miles away and there was no time to be lost. General Granger called an orderly, had Captain Alger's horse fed and insisted on his taking his morning meal with him. During breakfast the subject of Captain Sheridan's appointment was earnestly discussed. Before they had finished the meal Lieutenant Frank E. Walbridge, quartermaster of the Second Michigan cavairy rode up. Captain Alger asked permission to take him for his interview with Governor Blair. General Granger assented and the two officers prepared for the journey. It was perhaps half past nine in the morning when, armed with an earnest request for Sheridan's ap-pointment, they left the door of the federal lines and rode swiftly to Pittsburg landing. Captain Alger, who after-wards became a brigadier general, has frequently spoke to me of the anxieties of that ride, when he must have recalled something like the lines:

Ho, pony! down the lonely road, Sirike now your eneeriest pace, Camplifes cannot burn brighter

Than burns my anxious face, As each mile was tolled off the hour for the governot's departure grew nearer and nearer. It was only thirty-five minutes before two o'clock when they reached sight of the landing. It was within less than half an hour of the leaving time of the boat before General Granger's letter was placed in Governor Blair's hands.

As General Granger had suggested, the governor hesitated. He disliked the severity of the regular army officers and thought their influence over volunteers was detrimental rather than effective. The condition of the regiment was presented by Captain Alger in a few words, and both he and Lieutenant Walbridge strongly urged the force of General Granger's recommendation. The governor, impressed with their earnestness, yielded to their arguments, and just a few moments before the boat started, which was to convey him to Michigan, he turned to General John Robertson, his adjutant general, and said:

"Write an order appointing Captain Sheridan colonel of the Second Michigan cavalry, to take command at once."

Only a few moments were left for the adjutant general to act. He took a half sheet of note paper and wrote hurriedly these words:

PITTSBURG LANDING, May 25, 1862.-Cap tain Philip H. Sheridan is hereby appointed colonel of the Second Michigan cavalry. He is directed to take command at once. AUSTIN BLAIR, Governor, This was handed to Captain Alger and the boat pushed out into the Tennessee, and a great some. and a great soldier had been started on Captain Alger and Lieutenant Wal-bridge fed themselves and their horses, and as the gathering shadows of night drew over the battle field of Shiloh they started for a nall-night's ride toward the front. It was near daylight when the ride was mished. The exertion killed Alger's horse. Mounting another he rode to General Granger's headquarters and announced to that officer Captain Sheridan's appointment. General Granger directed him to carry it to Sheridan, who was some two miles distant at Halleck's headquarters. Alger obeyed, and a half hour later met for the first time his new colonel and future general. He presented him with his appointment and Phil Sheridan was that morning the happiest man in the whole of Halleck's army. The colonelcy which Ohio did not give her own son had Michigan provided. The officers of the staff were immediately summoned to celebrate his promotion. As the officers drank their bumpers of good cheer in his tent they wished his future success in loyal style. One brother officer of the staff more enthusiastic than the rest pledged the new colonel's health with the suggestion:

"This promotion is only one more step towards a brigadier's star."

How little men know of themselves.
Sheridan, flashed with the jey of the occasion, retorted:

"No, gentlemen, I thank you for ynor good wishes, but I want no higher honor.

I am now a colonel of cavalry. The next day he came over and took command of the regiment. He was a stranger to its officers as well as its rank and file. All of them were on tip-toe of expectation to see their new commander. His appearance was not heroic. He appeared at dress-parade clad in his regimentals and looked so small that it was Five acres in South Omaha for sale at a gargain.

He was never mustered in as its colonel and I do not think was ever commissioned as such for the demands of the service almost immediately called him on a raid during which he fought the battle of Booneville, Miss., which made him brig dier general within little more than a month from the day when he thought the measure of his success was full when he was made colonel of the Second Michigan cavalry. Captain Alger led a forlorn hope in that cavalry combat which made him a major.

There have been mighty changes since those days. Governor Blair went from the executive chair of Michigan to congress. Alger is now governor while Blair, who slid into the Greely movement in '72, is just coming back into the party fold again to tell the story of his good administration of Michigan's affairs during the war- In those days, at the age of seventeen, I was first sergeant of Captain Alger's company and only the other day with him recalled these facts of how one of the greatest generals on earth first secured a chance to make use of his great

FASHION'S FAVORITE FANCIES.

Colors of a Gentle Character-Varicty of Hair Arrangement -Jeweley for the Partially Undressed-Rough Kids.

New York, Feb. 2 .- [Correspondence of the BEE |-Everything bold and fluffy seems to have been concentrated on some goods recently brought out. Great blocks of long pile wavy plush, set among stripes of equally pronounced fabric; very broad stripes running down the goods and varied perhaps by small squares set within them on huge checks formed by transverse bars. These and kindred patterns are sometimes shown forth in alternations of color so brilliant hat they would be "loud" but for that refinement of dye which is always noticeable in expensive materials-that something which makes the red or yellow of an Axminster carpet, so different from the colorings of the ingrain. A pronounced shade of blue may alternate with gold and bronze; crimson with green, etc. These goods must of course be carefully handled and require OFFSETTINGS OF GENTLE CHARACTER and thus while the groundwork is silken and soft, the favorite, though not exclusive combination, is an extremely line grade of cashmere that composes the waist and a portion of the skirt. There is, however, a certain something in stripes and bars which prohibit them usually from all dress, strictly speaking, and these very striking costumes, therefore, are worn for afternoons, lunches, etc., rather than for a set ball. They are essentially in bad taste, yet they are unique and may express jauntiness. At all events, something different and a rehef from eternal repetition of fabrics really prettier but ess original. As an effort also towards change, come not infrequent combinaions of white and black for full dress, as where a white tulle is diversified by black chenille dots or plain white tulle orna-mented by bows of black velvet ribbon.

THE HAIR.

The decline of frizzes in the arrangement of the hair may be the prelude to a fall. Certainly they no longer fall as they once did and every day the brow begins to assert itself; coming forth to the light of day with waviness above, just sufficient to afford that broken outine so important to irregular features or where the countenance savors of the classic, the pompadour roll grows more and more in favor. The bang falling longer in the center and cut upwards at the sides, is still in vogue but is too unbecoming to be very popular. Nothing is really de riguer, except that we must not have too much of anything. Moderation everywhere and the moderately large coil or any other dressing is carried for the most part high on the head with nigrette of feathers, ribbon or flowers on one side. Oftenest by far, the first named and these pretty fancies being shown ready made, with little trouble one can provide a complete assortment. Now and then, however, some fashion-able lady wears her hair low and it proves an agreeable variety. Fancy pins and jewelled ornaments are still much worn. JEWELRY.

Low necks being in high favor, the lower the higher perhaps, as an obvious consequence, there is demand for a special class of jewels. Dressy, or more strictly speaking, partially undressed women atone for corsage deficiencies by rows of pearls or diamonds. Necklaces of these special kinds are in great request-one large diamond being the favorite clasp for a pearl necklace Twisted strings of seed pearls are thus kept together or solitaire glitters as the connecting link where a row or more of large pearls are placed successively. Variety is afforded by the most elegant pendants imaginable. Description utterly fails of justice to these masterpieces of art where the most refined skill is taxed for a beautiful assemblage of costly gems. Rare colored stones are combined or again there is the colder light of pearls and diamonds, small ones set closely together in simula-tion of a delicate flower or it may be a cross or some other device of large ones -blazing or gently glowing according to the choice made. Both stars and crescents are popular. The demand for ru-bies is large among those able to purchase this gem which jewelers and oisseurs consider rare and beautiful and combined with diamonds they adorn some of the most expensive pendants, Lovely and peculiar enameled brooches now imitate flowers in all variety of color and shape, from pure white to a pronounced red or the very dark crimson of a miniature dahlia. Now and then a large diamond is placed like a glittering with very pretty effect. Bracelets are still quite narrow, GLOVES,

The sale of long white kid gloves for evening has not hindered the continued wear of tan that is occasionally in quite dark shades, pale gray, pearl or helio-trope being also in favor; with delicate stitching on the back, which is in contrast to the great run on heavy stitching for day use; oftenest in contrast but again harmonizing with the glove. Undressed kid is in extraordinary demand for all occasions and some fashionable people will have nothing else.

TOILET ACCESSORIES.

Ebony is now the most fashiouable mounting for combs, brushes, hand-glasses, etc., the powder-box also being composed of this dark and handsome wood. Cunning little mirrors with sliding covers for pocket use are also made of it. Manicure sets running from $35 to $100, form curious subjects of specula tion. A handsome satin-lined box, en-closing seissors, one or more pair, file, prushes, powder, polisher, ointment, etc. What bachelor can read without dismay that belles may carry in the innocent form of a watch, a full supply of cosmet-les and means of applying them. Within the simulating circle, a puff saturated with powder, case of pencils for darkening the eyebrows, pink for the cheeks and a mirror set in the frame.
