HATTIE BENTON'S ADVENTURE A Sixteen-Year-Old Girl Shows Her

Grit on the Arkansas River.

The adventure of Hattie Benton, a girl of sixteen, with a gang of outlaws on the Arkansas river, proved her bravery to be qual to that of any man living. Soon after the war, while everything was yet in confusion in the south, and especially in the southwest, Benton moved from Missouri to Arkansas, and settled upon the Arkansas river at a point midway between Pine Bluffs and Arkansas Post. The country was then full of outlaws of all sorts, and robbery, assassination and murder was rife in the lonely sections. Benton lived on the bank of the river, and furnished wood to steamboats. Hattie was his only child, and had been acustomed to the wild life of the west since babyhood. The mother was an invalid, who could scarcely leave the house or wait upon herself. The father was a man of flery temper, and people soon learned that to attempt any love making with the girl would be pretty certain to end in somebody's death. The three or four gallants who came sighing about, were made to walk the plank, and in time it came to be known abong the river that the old man Benton looked upon his daughter as too good a match for any one in those parts. Then it was that an outlaw named Jack Cummerford sent the old man a message that he was coming to make Hattie his wife. The fellow was proprietor of a floating whisky shanty, and had two or three hard cases constantly with him. While there was no question that this crew were guity of stealing and robbing and worse, the victims hesitated to complain, and the law to arrest.

Cummerford heard of the girl long enough before he saw her, and the first Benton heard of the outlaw was by way of a message in which Cummerford told him that he would be on hand in about ten days to look the girl over, and if she suited him he would take her away. The father boiled over at the impudence of the message and, he arranged to kill the outlaw on sight. Had it been known just how he would come Cummerford would have been welcomed with a bullet, but the messenger did not state that part of it, and after being on his guard several days the father began to relax his vigilance and believe themessage to be nothing more than an idle boast. One morning he went down to the wood piles to find a shantyboat moored at the bank and a rough-looking fellow just coming ashore, Jack Cummerford and his gang had arrived, and the villain intended to make his words good. Benton was not armed; the out-law had a rifle in his hands. Suspecting some evil, the pioneer started to retreat, but was shot in the back before he had gone thirty feet, and he was dead almost as soon as the outlaw reached him. The three men then proceeded to the house together. The mother and daughter were preparing breakfast, and were ordered to make provisions for their visitors. They had heard the rifle shot, but before they could voice their suspicions of what had happened the "Come, now, hurry up. I've come to take the gai away, and as I thought the old man might object I just laid him out on the start. No snivelling, now, but get breakfast ready and then prepar' to go with me.

The mother was so overcome that she dropped into a chair and began moaning and weeping. It was a terrible shock to the girl, but she realized from the first moment that if she was to be saved from the fate planned for her she must save herself. She therefore went ahead with the preparations for the meal, and about the time the men were told to sit down by the table the mother hobbled out and sat down beside the dead body of her husband, so dazed and terrified that she husband, so dazed and terrified that she could not shed a tear. After the first shock the girl began to plan against the gang, and every move made by the men was narrowly watched. As the place was isolated they had no fear of being disturbed, and took matters very lessurely. They talked of the shooting of Benton as coolly as if they had only fired upon a dog, and as they drew up to the table Cummerford observed:

"Ought to have hit him about two

"Ought to have hit him about two inches lower, but it wasn't so bad for snap shot. Kinder sorry for the old woman, but she'll feel better after we fling the body into the river. Say, gal, how d'ye like me, anyway? You orter be proud of such a man as Jack Cummer-

"Come, Jack, be a bit easy on her dutil we get alloat," remarked one of the others.

"Oh, sartin," chuckled the outlaw.

"She's kind of 'fraid of me now, but she'll soon be proud of her husband. Rather pooty gal, Hatty is. Sorry I didn't come last week, but my motto is to attend to bizness furst. Say, gal, don't be afeard to laugh it you feel like it,"

Cummerford had brought his rifle or carbine to the house, while the others had left their firearms aboard of the boat, The carbine leaned against the wall in the rear of the men, and just as they got fairly to eating the girl examined it sufficiently to note that the chamber contained four or five bullets. No sooner was she certain of this than she snatched it up, and sprang out of doors, and as it up, and sprang out of doors, and as she ran for her mother, who was in the direct line of the boat, she called for her to leave the body and hasten aboard the craft. Dazed as she was, the mother did not hesitate a second in complying, and she was aboard before any of the outlaws she was aboard before any of the outlaws came out. When they did appear it was to find the girl with the carbine at an aim, covering the mother's retreat, and walking slowly backward herself. The ruffians were all upset for the moment. Then Cummerford sprang into the cabin after the dead many rifle. after the dead man's rifle, and when he reappeared he brought it to his face and commanded the girl, who was by that time on board of the shanty boat and time on board of the shanty boat and trying to cast off the line to come ashore. She paid him not the least attention, and he coolly fired at her head. The bullet drew blood from the edge of her right ear, and in retaliation she picked up the carbine and fired an off-hand shot, which killed the man who stood on the right of Cummerford. The recoil of the heavy piece knocked her down, but before they could rush upon her the mother seized an axe and cut the line, and the boat floated away on the current.

boat floated away on the current, Cummerford ran back into the cabin after ammunition, but before he found it the boat was half a mile below the house, and when he opened fire the women sheltered themselves in the cabin. As fast as he could load and fire he fired upon the boat, hoping that a stray shot might wound or kill. The girl made no reply until the current carried the boat into a tree top on the opposite side of the stream. Then, when the outlaws began to prepare to swim or float off to it she opened fire from the three or four loaded revolvers hanging in the cabin, and did such good shooting as to force them to abandon the attempt.

Had it been coming on dark the two men would doubtless have found means to recover the boat and recapture the women, but the craft had not been de-tained more than an hour in the tree top, when a government survey party came, along and were soon in possession of all the particulars. The women were taken off, the boat was stripped of its plunder, and then the structure was given over to the flames. During this time two men were landed to hunt for the wretches, but like the cowards they were they left the locality with all possible spead, and Cummerford was not heard of again until killed in a fight at Arkansas Post.
