

SORROWS OF A POOR OLD MAN.

The Summer Love Making of the Aged Van Pelt Brought to a Sudden Close.

FASHION'S LATEST FREAKS.

Impudent Waiters—A New Summer Drink—Some Queer Women—Gossip of Fashions—Clara Bella's Letter.

New York, August 11.—(Correspondence of the Bee.)—Mr. Van Pelt planted his family at Asbury Park and figuratively chained himself to his desk in town.

Mrs. Van Pelt bethought herself, the other day, that the insurance on her house had run out, and instead of bothering that poor darling with more business, she would skip up to town, get some needed things, and pop in on her husband just before taking the train.

She was in the city at the afternoon. Not only business men, but their wives, daughters, sweethearts, and so forth, come along, too. They divide themselves between the various good hotels and attractions, take a bath, and a dinner, listen to a concert, perhaps, and return on the last train. Some of them stay for the night, and this is especially the case on a Saturday.

One has to make a fair job of dinner after the bath. The dining halls are immense and the tables extend all over the broad verandahs, but there are always many more customers than can be accommodated between 5:30 and 8 o'clock.

It is one of the amusing sights of the beach for those who are not hungry to watch the little groups of fashionable men and women surrounding tables where the diners seem to be pretty nearly through with their eating.

There is no system of reserving tables for patrons and the head waiter is powerless to assist. First come first served. If you are bold and sharp enough to take possession of the table, the occupants were just a couple of gentlemen had been standing at a table for more than half an hour.

It was occupied by a young man and his girl when they arrived, and they picked out the vacant table, and the waiter, after a couple of minutes' waiting, gave up and left them to their own devices.

A GLASS OF FROTHY BEER.

The Favorite Beverage—How It Is Consumed in Omaha—Facts and Fancies.

SOME SKILLFUL BEER-SLINGERS.

The Hard-Worked Jerkers and the Impatient Customers—Beer as a Social Ingredient—Gossip.

Written for the Omaha Sunday Bee.

In twenty years, lager beer has become the popular beverage of the nation. It is drunk in the saloon, at the picnic, in the garden, and is even found in the family which would scorn to appreciate it under the eye of the public.

It finds patrons where a dealer in the necessities of life would drop into bankruptcy. It has dethroned ale and whined from whiskey many a victim who had lingered dangerously near its throne.

As a consequence, there has arisen all over the land a species of massive structures of peculiar shape and design in which it is brewed, and there have also sprung into existence edifices of less magnitude, but proportionately as valuable, in which, amidst elegant surroundings, this amber liquid is dispensed to thirsty mortals.

In the summer season, especially when the temperature conduces to weariness and thirst, the beer saloon is a thing of exceeding life and interest. It is a babel of many tongues. It is a mixture of many races. It is a collection of thirsty souls, fatigued frames, weary minds and convivial spirits.

There are sweeter bartenders, rushing waiters and the clinking of glasses together with some excitement, and the clatter of a teapoonful of time, and the clatter of a teapoonful of time, and the clatter of a teapoonful of time.

There are, however, some who are not so easily pleased. They are the "jerkers" and "slingers" who are ill-paid and ill-appreciated mortals, when the abuse and censure to which they are subjected is not enough to satisfy them.

But though frequently contemned, they have the silent sympathy and appreciation of thousands of thirsty devotees who recognize in their ministrations the art of enabling them to work in the most efficient manner.

They are the "jerkers" and "slingers" who are ill-paid and ill-appreciated mortals, when the abuse and censure to which they are subjected is not enough to satisfy them. They are the "jerkers" and "slingers" who are ill-paid and ill-appreciated mortals.

THE SOLDIERS OF THE CROSS.

Some of the Methods Employed by the Salvation Army.

THE DETACHMENT IN OMAHA.

'A Paper as Bitter as the Omaha Bee'—Some of the Leading Lights—A Tramp with the Army by a Wicked Reporter.

The Salvation Army, like the poor of which it is composed, is everywhere, and it is a poor town in which the sound of the tambourine and the rattle of the drum cannot be heard, chasing away the devils. Omaha being a booming city has its army and one of the evening sights greeting the stranger, is the well-known procession, which reminds him of his home, if he comes from a booming place.

These people never seem to tire. Day after day they march the dusty streets, in heat and storm, in season and out, the same old peck-a-boo bonneted females, and red-shirted men, led by the same old leader who plays two tunes on a brass cornet.

Sometimes the tunes get mixed and blend in one air, but they never vary. People know them by heart, and so certain it is after long waiting the cornetist will never learn any new music, that old delvers promise faithfully within themselves that they will not blow his lungs into space on a new tune.

A prowler from the Bee, desiring to pray for six bad men in Omaha, followed the army around last night through the streets and went with it to the barracks. The barracks are a temple war. People know them by heart, and so certain it is after long waiting the cornetist will never learn any new music.

OMAHA'S BEER INTERESTS.

San Francisco Chronicle: At a recent meeting of the local county Pomological society Milton Thomas, an experienced fruit-grower, delivered an address on the fruit interests of California, which was full of valuable information.

He said that the fruit-growers of California were producing more than enough to supply the demand of the United States. The variety I would advise to grow are the white varieties. There are now annually imported from foreign countries.
