CAST AWAY ON A DESERT ISLAND. A Mate Murders His Captain and is Left Alone to Die.

A San Francisco special to the New York World relates the story: The Honolulu Commercial Advertiser of December 7 gives the following account of the adventures of two survivors of the schooner General Segel, who spent nine months on the South Sea islands.

The two survivors of the General Segel's crew are a young man named Edward Olsen, a native of Norway, and a German lad of nineteen, named William Timpe. In the course of a conversation with them the following account of their experiences was gathered: The general Segel left Honolulu on September 1, 1886, for the French Frigate Shoals on a shark-fishing expedition.

Her crew was composed of Captain Aberdine, Adolph Jorgen, the mate; the two men already named, Peter Larkin, Brown, Martin, Neilson and Charles Clemens. In the outset of the voyage the crew were very successful in obtaining quite a large cargo. On September 23 they arrived off Midway island. On the night of November 11 the vessel was riding at anchor off this island, the crew being camped on shore. The intention was to leave for Honolulu on the following day.

Towards midnight a gale arose, the vessel broke from her moorings and drifted ashore, and the crew found themselves cast upon a desert island in mid-ocean. Their only means of subsistence was sea birds and their eggs and fish. Fortunately there was no lack of this kind of food, and an ample supply of fresh water was at hand. Under these conditions they dragged out a weary existence for nine months, and their experiences during that time marked by some thrilling episodes, some of which will probably form the subject of future investigation.

About ten days after they reached the island a painful accident happened to Peter Larkin. While killing fish with gins, a net over one of his hands was blown off, and although everything done to alleviate his sufferings he succumbed to the injury and died in a few days. After this a feud appears to have arisen between Matt Jorgen and William Timpe, which the survivors attribute solely to the murderous instincts of the mate. It is stated that on one occasion this man deserted from the German vessel Apollo while at Honolulu, where he was arrested in consequence. The circumstances connected with this caused him to entertain feelings of enmity towards the German consul, in this city, and brooding over his anger he repeatedly expressed his intention while on the island of taking that gentleman's life at the first opportunity. Captain Aberdine remonstrated with him and he, fearing what might be the upshot of these threats, seems to have turned his hand not only against the captain, but against other members of the crew. William Timpe says that on one occasion, while he was alone in the hut which they occupied, taking up some eggs to serve at the meal, Jorgen came stealthily behind him, put a rope around his neck and attempted to strangle him. The lad called loudly for help, when the rope was slackened and Jorgen desisted from his purpose, saying: "Don't say anything about it. I don't want to do you any harm."

It should be stated here that what is known as Midway island is in reality two islands, one in circular form, the other a long, narrow strip of land, some two or three miles to the north. Arriving at the island the men found an old hut which the men utilized as a domicile; a Japanese scow, supposed to have been left there by Captain Boham, and a boat belonging to the wrecked vessel Dan notar Crete, which had evidently drifted there from Ocean island. They also saved a boat from the General

Sigel, but very little in the way of stores. There was thus no great difficulty in making the trip across to the smaller island.

While the captain and a sailor named Brown were on one of the islands after eggs Jorgen murdered them. When the others found that Jorgen returned alone they taxed Jorgen with it. He said they had committed suicide. Olsen and Timpe and two other seamen determined to leave Jorgen on the island. They accordingly destroyed the boat and on June 28 sailed away in the scow, leaving the murderous mate alone. The four then headed for Marshall island and arrived there after a passage of two months and a half. They were there twenty days when the schooner Ehukai took two of them, Edward Olsen and William Timpe, to Jaluit. The other two were left there to be taken by the schooner Jennie Walker. Arriving at Jaluit the two men on the Ehukai were taken on board the bark Lillian at Jaluit and brought to Honolulu.
