A Pathetic Scene. Chicago Times: They had taken th train at Grinnell on the Iowa Central and were en route from Missouri to their home in St. Paul. Their plain but neat dress told of their moderate circumstances in life. The youngest child, a sweet baby of only about two years, was ill, and the journey seemed long to the anxious mother. Down from the home of the ice king came the wild storm, but the train fought its way desperately, and finally reached Lyle, in the southern edge of Minnesota. Further progress was impossible. "Trains all abandoned" was the unwelcome message that came over the wire. Night passed and morning came, and night again. For four days the anxious par-ents watched the young life going out into the unknown. Finally word came that the first train would go north within an hour. As it pulled out of Lyle there were in the coach a father, mother, and two children. Th father carried in his arms a little bundle tenderly wrapped in a shawl. The con-ductor came through to collect the tickets. He was feeling jolly, evidently glad to be on the road again. "Got your fortune in that bundle?" he jocosely remarked to the passenger. A tear stole down the father's bronzed cheek, and the conductor became suddenly sober. Placing his hands upon the bundle he started back, for he felt a tiny baby arm through the shawl. "Yes," said the father, whose lips were quivering, "it's our baby. We wanted to get home be-fore she died, but the storm came and we could not." The conductor turned back a corner of the shawl and gazed a moment at the still, white face, from which even death could not drive the cunning dimples or the baby smile. Suddenly the thought of the company's regulations and the law prohibiting the car-rying of the dead upon the trains. In halting sentences he explained the case in the father, saying that he could only carry it to the next station. They were penniless, and to be put off among strangers in such a climate with the little dead child in their care seemed like a cruel hardship to them. The father looked dazed, and a cry of despair broke from the mother's trembling fips. The conductor was scarcely less affected. Stooping down he said in a low, almost inaudible tone: "I don't know what you have in that bundle, and I don't wan't to either. I have children of my own at home. Guess we'll get through on time." The baby is sleeping now where its mother can watch the flowers grow o'er the little mound in the springtime, and there is one railway conductor whose name with
