Co-Operation in the United States.

America: The one fact that stands out beyond all others in the "History of Co-Operation in the United States," is a valuable and timely compilation just issued in connection with studies in historical and political science by the John Hopkins university, is that success in co-operation depends almost entirely upon the personal equation in the co-operators. Wherever these are animated by the true spirit of organization the resolution to surmount difficulties, the unselfishness to make sacrifices, and the courage to put the good of association before sentiment, then there is hope in co-operation. But let these be persons who are untrained in habits of subordination and unhesitating obedience, co-operation will yield none of the fruits which its success is so well calculated to supply to the thrifty laboring man and the mechanic. "It is only by the exercise of frugality," said President Earle, to the National Association of the Sovereigns of Industry, at Washington, in 1878, "that the workingman can be enabled to surround himself and his family with the comforts of life. Co-operation will not benefit him if he does not cultivate provident habits.

Beyond a doubt "the underlying cause of all co-operative failures are lack of intelligence and of the spirit of co-operation." This is the story that runs all through the book under consideration. Here we find the subject of co-operation treated in a purely historical manner. Beginning with the New England states, the subject is followed in its inception, development and present condition in the several divisions of the union. It is treated in detail in its distributive, productive and profit-sharing phases, and everywhere comes to the same conclusion: where the co-operators are possessed of the requisite intelligence, the hard sense to choose competent men for managers, and the wisdom to accept moderate terms, they have succeeded. Where they have been lacking in these where the management has fallen into the hands of dishonest or inefficient men, where attention has been turned to politics instead of economics, or where greed for large returns has choiced discretion, they have failed.

Among the examples of the survival of the fittest may be cited the Natick (Mass.) Protective union, incorporated in 1860 under the state law, its object being declared to be "to reduce the cost of living." It started with 200 $10 shares; it has now $6,000 paid in capital in 500 shares, distributed among 675 shareholders. The business of this has been under the management of one man—Issue A. Flegg—from its beginning, and he has seen his trade grow to over $100,000 a year, even while not selling to make a large profit—"we prefer to benefit the consumer" being the motto. Although the par value of shares is only $10, it is quoted at $10, which is not surprising when it is considered that in 1883 the profit on each share was $7.50. Goods are sold to every one, whether stockholders or not, discounts being given to members.

One of the oldest of successful productive co-operative associations, "with out dividends to labor," is the Somerset, Mass., Foundry company. It was organized in 1807. Its capital is $30,000 in 1000 shares, owned by forty-eight stockholders, thirty of whom are in the business, and such are given preference in hiring men. Equal wages for equal work are paid to all employees, whether stockholders or not, but it is declared that "stock-owning improves the quality and increases the quantity of work accomplished, and this goes far to account for the success attained." According to the report for

S. P. MORSE & CO.

1886, this company has been turning out an annual product of $75,000, and since 1880 has been paying a dividend of 10 per cent.

Among the productive associations with dividends to labor, that founded by the Knights of Labor and known as "The Boot and Shoe Company of Lynn, Mass.," affords a successful illustration of its kind. It was organized in 1855. Its capital is $9,000, in 1000 shares, in the hands of about sixty persons. Ten shares is the limit anyone can own. Over forty shareholders are employed in the business, and are given the preference in securing work. All workmen must be Knights of Labor, and all those who are not shareholders are encouraged to deposit toward a share.

The net profits on the first year, after paying the operatives "the highest scale of wages in Lynn," were $1,000—a capital stock which was not raised from $4,000 to $8,000 until three months before the accounting. Profits are to be thus divided: 10 per cent goes to the sinking fund; 5 per cent is paid on the capital stock; 10 per cent of the remainder goes to the Knights of Labor assembly for a co-operative fund to be used in assisting other co-operative enterprises, 45 per cent is to go to capital, 45 per cent to labor, in proportion to the work done by each, and divided with the results," says Mr. Richard Nagle, under whose management the association was organized. Here is a field of labor in which the Knights of Labor can do a mighty sight more for the capitalist stockholder than he can do in the maintenance of strikes.

In regard to profit sharing between those who furnish the capital and those who do the labor, a noteworthy example is given from the northwest. In 1882 Mr. Charles A. Pillsbury, of the famous Pillsbury milling firm, determined to try the profit sharing plan in the establishment of his company. Of the 400 to 500 men employed in the mills, about 25 per cent were made eligible to a share in the profits after 10 per cent had been deducted as interest on capital invested. These men were those in responsible positions or whose work could be properly classed as skilled labor, and second, those employees who had been in the service of the firm continuously for five years. At the end of the first year the amount set apart to be distributed among the employees was in excess of $40,000, and being apportioned among about 100 men, gave to each an average of $400, which was said to be equivalent to about one third of the wages received by each. In 1883 about the same total was distributed to an increased number of men, and in 1885 $40,000 of the profits were again divided among about one-third of those on the payroll. In 1886 the firm struck a bad year and there were no profits to divide, but each employee received a frank statement of the situation, and, as all had been paid their wages promptly and without any reduction, they accepted it gracefully and loyally. The Pillsbury company still believes that the best results ever obtained in its business may be expected through the profit-sharing co-operation it has adopted with its employees.

The history of co-operation in the United States demonstrates that the want of sound legislation, the lack of general uniformity respecting the possibilities and limitations of co-operation, together with the mischievous interference of selfish and pestiferous agitators who seek to set class against class and breed discord where there should be harmony, are the chief obstacles in the way of the more universal adoption of a system which is so bene-
