

MANUFACTURE OF POTTERY.

What was Known of the Art by Ancient Nations.

GLAZING A MODERN ADVANCE.

Growth of the Art in Europe—The Potteries of England, Holland and Germany—The Art in America.

The Ceramic Art.

Brooklyn, Aug. 11. It is a characteristic feature of the manufacturing industrial life of Brooklyn that it has great variety. It is not all of one kind. The industries are many and they are as distinctive as they are numerous.

Young, too, as Brooklyn is, she has won distinction in some of the very oldest departments of industry. Of these, prominent mention must be made of her numerous potteries. Of these she can boast of no fewer than twelve separate establishments—all occupied in the different departments of the ceramic art.

Pottery was known to the northern nations—the Greeks and the Scandinavians—long before the Roman conquests of Gaul and Britain. As far back as the stone and bronze periods large and small vessels were in use, and they are found to-day among the archeologists.

Much of the beauty of the ceramic art is dependent upon the glazed or enameled surface of the wares. The history of the higher grades of the art is the history of the glazes. In other words the art has approached perfection very much as the secret of glazing has been thoroughly mastered.

The highest quality of goods produced by the potter are those which pass under the title of chinaware or porcelain. Both names are a little general. Commonly speaking, all white ware used for table purposes, as well as all fancy or ornamental ware of the better sort, is called porcelain or chinaware.
