Mother's "Punkin" Pic. New York Times: It was a perfectly harmless remark in itself and made without reflection or forethought. We were sipping our coffee after dinner the other night and there was a casual reference to Thanksgiving. Something prompted me to say:

"How I used to look forward to Thanksgiving when I was a boy. It was one of the events of the year to select and bring in from the cornfield the it made! Somehow I don't get any pumpkin pies nowadays such as mother used to make!" I took a sip of coffee and lazily puffed at my cigarette without a suspicion of Thanksgiving pumpkin, and what pies having turned on the consequences, as An ominous sort of silence made ma glance, after a minute, across at my Her face was flushed and she choked

a little as she began to speak:
"To begin with, John," she said
"don't say punkin. The p should be distinctly sounded, and in the next place, do you know what I have a mind to do?" I confessed that to prognosticate her mental gyrations was beyond me.

"Well," she went on, ignoring the interruption, "I have a strong mind to give you one of those same pumpkin pies such as your mother used to make. I hope I am superior to any small jealbut I am thoroughly weary about this talk of old-fashioned cookery. Why, do you know, John, that I have eaten fried steak at your mother's table, and baked potatoes served in a covered dish? What would you say to have either of-fered you now? The actual fact is that the cooking of fifteen or twenty years ago is not to be compared in any way with that of to-day. We have advanced in that as in all the sciences." And she shook her fingers out of her finger bowl with unnecessary vim, and rubbed them with her napkin more vigorously than the occupation demanded. "All this may be true," I allowed, judiciously, "but spare me, I pray you, that idel of my boyhood--the Thanksgiving pumpkin pie." And I sounded the p broadly, hoping to appease the iconoclastic indignation I had unwittingly aroused.

"I can't," replied Mrs. John, relent-lessly. "I can't, really, and be honest."
"Recall for yourself the actual pic of which you speak separated from all its surrounding, and answer me truthfully if I describe it neight. It was yellowish brown in color, except in occasional spots, where the blistered top had broken under uneven heat; it was very shallow, the filling barely twice exceeding the crust in thickness when it was cut, and its flavor was strong of pump-kins, with various spices more or less predominating.

"You were apt to find little pieces of the vegetable in your mouthful, which had escaped the coarse-holed colander through which it had been strained, and you were fortunate if the under-crust was not 'soggy,' as in 'those good old days' it was the fashion to bake 'batches' of pies weekly to last through the following seven days, a custom which did not add to the wholesomeness of such pies as survived the first day. And this, my dear, is the 'pumpkin' pie of your boyhood."

My silence attested the truth of this assertion. "But what," she went on, "is the pumpkin pie of to-day? A very different and a much more successful gastronomic production. As a friend said to me the other day, "I consider a pump-kin pie the excuse for all good things I have in my storeroom—sugar, cream, eggs, a dash of sherry, a little lemon, mace, cinnamon, nutmeg—then repeat ad libitum,' she finished with a laugh.

"The modern pie," pursued my wife, "is a solitaire, or at most two at a baking, and the undercrust is slightly baked first, before the filling is put in, the 'soggy' characteristic is entirely left out. You will miss, too, the lumpy element from the properly-made pie of to-day; we strain the pumpkin through a sieve; we also use deep dishes, which takes away from the slab appearance of the delicacy. Finally, when this toothsome and altogether delicious article of food is offered at dessert, grated cheese is served with it, and if you will once more turn a retrospective eye upo the past you will discover that the cheese of the farm larder invariably appeared at supper, while the pastry dessert of the noonday dinner was unaccompanied by its natural and wholesome relish. "Oh!" ejaculated Mrs. John, with sudden vehemence, "can't you recall those dreadful country teas with cubes of yellow-rubber cheese piled on one plate, and long, pale-green pickles on another, flanking the caster on either side? Was there ever a more complete embodiment of green and yellow melan-

My mind naturally moves slowly, and before I found a reply to this sudden parenthetical appeal my wife had got back to the main road, so to speak, of her harangue.

"No, John," she continued rather sadly, "it is not the pumpkin pie, pure and simple, of your childhood which you fondly recall, it is the pumpkin pie seasoned with your boyish appetite, the pumpkin pie surrounded by the acces-sories of your dear and familiar home, the pumpkin pie, in fact, set in the glorious halo of your youth!

"You say it was the event of the year to bring in Thanksgiving pumpkin. I am sure it was. Yet I don't suppose it would give you any especial pleasure to go down to Fulton market to-morrow go down to Fulton market to-morrow and half carry, half roll home one of those great yellow vegetables.

"But out in the cornfield back of your father's house, the cornfield whose boundary was the sparkling, dancing brook, and whose background was the everlasting hills bathed in the lovely haze of autumn, out in that cornfield in the mellow October afternoon, every breath inspiring the delicious air which had in it such an indescribable mixture of summer languor describable mixture of summer languor and crisp, frosty vim, and every nerve tingling with the unconscious but vivi-fying essence of healthy, happy, boy-heod---that indeed was an event.

"Here amid the city's turmoll that grows at times so tiresome and monotonous; with the responsibilities and anxieties which every man of family feels, and with the weight of years beginning ever so little, to press, I de not wonder that the happenings of those care-free days stand out in hold reliaf care-free days stand out in bold relief, but in justice, my dear, to the science of gastronomy and to the development and progress of the day, tear down from its hallowed niche in your memory the dun and bilious image of old-fashioned 'punkin' pie."

The Curse of Speculation. Chicago News: It was a doubtful state. On a lonely road a traveler met a highwayman.

a highwayman.

"Hold up your hands," said the robber, bringing a big revolver into view.

The traveler obligingly heid up his hands.

"Have you any valuables?" inquired the highwayman.

"Yes," faltered the traveler. "I have a vote which I am taking to the political headquarters to sell!"

"Ah, you haven't sold it then "exclaimed the robber, bitterly. The voters all appear to be waiting for a rise in the market. This curse of space matter is ruising my business."
