THE WIFE OF A GREAT PRESIDENT. The scribe gazed at the Turkish rug, upholstered and richly furnished state of the car, and then dropped into a remote corner apparently lost in costly drapery. Satisfied that he had extended the ethics of even reportorial etiquette, he decided to lie in another ambush until the magnate put in appearance to devote his time to devising means of escape in case of fire—by that dignitary. But Mrs. Strong took a different view of the situation, as compared with most women, and, in short, the reporter found himself consulting with a full-fledged railroad woman. Did she understand the situation? Well, just as well as many a man who now revels in the presidency of a trunk line. She was posted on the financial outlook, inter-state law, the president's agreement, the stock market on Wall street, and in fact everything essential to a person high up in railroad circles. She knows the technicalities, and can answer questions pertaining to railroad matters in a language and with a degree of intelligence which would greatly test the ability of the best traffic managers to equal.
