A Flendish Scene Portrayed. A party of emigrants on the way from the East in 1857, to the Golden States, after having escaped the perils of the plains had encamped in the Pah Rane-ghat Valley in Southern Utah at a place now known as Mountain Valley. No Indians were near except those known to be friendly, while the valley was thickly peopled with Mormon settlers. The emigrants, one hundred and twenty-one in number, had a large stock of horses, cattle, wagon and household goods, and staid a long time for rest and recuperation for their animals before resuming their journey across the wild deserts of Nevada. They never reached their destination, and many years elapsed before their fate was known. The wealth they possessed in horses and cattle excited the cupidity of the Mormons who in combination with a few villianous Indians surprised them in the night and not a soul was left to tell the horrible story. Men, women and children alike, met an indiscriminate slaughter. The band of Mormons, led by the infamous Porter Rockerell, were disguised as Indians, and it was only where a conscience striken Mormon years afterward told the tale, which was vouched for by the bleaching bones found on the spot that vengeance fell on the perpetrators of this dastardly crime. Even after a lapse of thirty years the place is looked upon with hor-ror and the inhabitants of the valley speak of it with bated breath. This harrowing scene true in all its details is faithfully reproduced in the great Wild West show which is joined to the bippodrome and menagerie of the world renowned Forepaugh combination. It will be here Thursday, August 22nd.
