Ventilation in sick Rooms. The sick room should always and in all weathers, says the Ladies' Home Journal be ventilated with outside air. An excellent plan is to keep open a door into an adjoining room, where a window is up, or a board may be fitted into the top of the upper sash so that this may be kept lowered, allowing the fresh air to enter through the space thus created between the sashes, and if all other ways fail, simply lower the upper sash of the window farthest from the bed, and keep it down two inches night and day. important as this mat-ter of ventilation is, especially in lung trouble—it may be over-done, and care must continually be exercised and ex-
