The exchange, he hoped, would be the means of bringing business men and property owners together in closer and more harmonious union. "One misfortune of a rapidly growing city," said Mr. Hitchcock, "is that we grow apart as our interests spread and diversity. We don't cooperate. We fall to establish a standard for business. In this particular, We can come here and exchange views and transact our business and get acquainted, and good recults are sure to follow." He closed by urging the exchange to stand pledged to transact real estate business by straight, legitimate and conservative methods and make the real estate business as solid and reliable and locitimate as the backing business.

He congratulated the young men of the exchange and the city on Omaha's flattering prospects and upon the new departure of the real estate exchange. Dr. Miller is never happier than when booming Omaha and in his speech yeaterday he was at his best. He told the exchange that the first and most necessary element of presperity was confidence. He had been compelled for thirty five years to listen to strong men croaking about Omaha's dismal future and all the time the city was growing and prospering. He wanted eyery citizen of Omaha to stock to the truth and stant as all times ready to declare that Omaha is the best based day on its resources in the union.

Dr. Miller said that the young men in the room would see Omaha with a population of 400,000. It is as inevitable as the laws of the universe, and all of the creating of chronic grumblers cannot retard the growth, but the carnest and united offort of the clitices of Omaha can greatly accelerate it.
