The Queer Traffic Established by Henry Bruckman in the Garden City.

KEPT CHOICE CUTS FROM FAVORITES.

Old Broken Down Street Car Steeds and Animals that Only Long for Death Killed and Turned Into Food.

Henry Bruckman, a thrifty young German not long from the fatherland, began about a month ago to revolutionize the cheap meat industry of Chicago by furnishing those who could not afford to buy beef with what he considered an excellent quality of old horse. The health department, however, got after him and forced him to give up the novel enterprise by which he proposed to fatten the poor and fill his purse. Bruckman selected a lonely sight for his headquarters on the north bank of the canal, three-quarters of a mile west of Western avenue, says the Chicago Herald. Here he established a slaughterhouse, stable and smoke-house, where horses could be kept, cut up and prepared for the market. Old horses, crippled horses and any other class of horses fit only to die were picked up about the city by Bruckman and driven to his preserves. Here they were killed and cut up with an eye to profit. The hind quarters were taken out with care and hung up in a nook in the barn for immediate consumption. The tenderloins were preserved largely for home consumption, and other parts not suited for steaks or roasts were cut up and corned. The coarser portions of a carcass were stewed for the hogs.

Although Bruckman was not willing to admit that he had sold any horseflesh he confessed that a good business might be done in that line. "I feed it to my hogs," he said last night, "although I don't believe it wrong to sell it if you tell the people what kind of meat they are buying?" are buying.

"How many horses do you kill in a week?" he was asked. "O sometimes six or eight, and sometimes more."

'How many hogs have you?"

"And will ten hogs cat all the horse meat you have?" "Well, no, but I was going to get more Just then Mrs. Bruckman put in an appearance, and when asked how she regarded horseflesh as an article of food, she frankly admitted that the choice cuts were to her taste superior to any beef she could afford to buy. "Why," she went on, "my neighbor used to send up here every morning for a steak, and if you look at her children you will see for yourself that they are fat and healthy as any boys and girls you can find. Come it the house and I will show you a cou-ple of quarters that we saved for our-

Hanging on pegs in a back room were two quarters of an old horse, weighing about one hundred pounds each. These, she explained, escaped the kerosone can of the health inspector. In a few days, she went on, they would be fit to cut up into steaks, roasts and soups. "You see," she said, it has to be a little old before it it's real good. Age makes it tender."

Under the influence of his wife's frankness, Bruckman himself discoursed upon the qualities of horseflesh, and repelled the insinuations that had been made about his killing diseased horses for food. "Do you think," he said, "that I would kill a sick horse for my table? Not much. Any meat that I save for food must be from a good, healthy horse."

"How does horseflesh compare with beef?" he was asked.

"It's a little stronger," he replied "but when a person gets use to it the flavor is found to be much better. It's a little hot for the blood at first, and a person must not eat too much until ne gets use to it."

In the rear of the house Bruckman had recently built a shed which had all the elements of a smoke house. He said this was his goose shed, and he stuck his luntern into the door and stirred up a flock of geese in order to verify his statement; but when his attention was called to the fact that the shed was too called to the fact that the shed was too high for a goose house, headmitted that he had originally intended the shed for a smoke house. Here his lean old horse, for which he could not find a ready market, could be dried and smoked and smoked and sold as a cheap grade of dried beef. People who bought grade of dried beef. People who bought the fresh quarters would, according to Beuckman's logic, buy smoked horse. But Bruckman's industry has been in-terfered with, and he said last night that he would be obliged to give up the business. Indeed, he promised Health Commissioner Wickersham yesterday afternoon that he would kill no more horses at his lonely establishment. The horses at his lonely establishment. The health commissioner warned him that he would get into serious trouble unless he kept his word.

Upon reflection Bruckman is disposed to relent, having promised so much to the commissioner, for he is not quite certain but he is only exercising his rights in carrying on a traffic in horse flesh. He explained last night that he had not been long enough in this country to have become familiar with its many peculiar institutions and he could not understand the laws of a free land which forbade what he thought was a commendable enterprise. Mrs. Bruckman volunteered, the statement that such a business was much in the nature of a charity, for if her husband was per-mitted to sell horse flesh many poor people could have meat on their tables. Bruckman had investigated his legal rights far enough to learn that he was danger of the authorities if he should sell meat without a license, and he had learned, too, that he could not sell horse flesh under the name of beef,

"I can put out a sign here," he said,
"offering horse meat for sale, and I don't believe any one could interfere with me." When reminded that the slaughter of cattle was under surveillance, and that the killing of horses would be also, Mrs. Bruckman heaved a sigh and said she thought they would have to give up the business. But she added: "It is too bad for the poor people who will have to go without meat."

It is supposed Bruckman has a busi-ness connection with some of the cheap restaurants about town, but so far it has not been possible to trace any of his dead horse to a restaurant table.

The Earth's Volcanoes.

Even now we have some active vol-canoes of no little energy on our earth, and we know that in former days the volcances must have been still more powerful; that, in fact, the Vesuvius of the present must be merely a popgun in comparison with volcances which have shaken the earth in those primitive days when it had just cooled down from its Ruined by Coffee Drinking. Talking about coffee and nerves, there is a rich Bowery restaurateur who is said to have made himself a physical wreck through his pride in serving good coffee to his customers. In big restau-rants the coffee is put in a sieve or bag inside an ura and then steam is turned on to boil it. The cooks are apt to be gin to serve it before the beans are well steamed. The restaurant keeper in question tested every brewing of coffee in his place for years, and allowed none to be rerved until it was rich and strong. Of course he always added the usual two ounces o chicory to each pound of coffee. He nearly killed himself. He shakes like a leaf in a gale.

DID DEPEW GET EVEN?

A New York Central Official Tells

Story on Chauncey. "William Sims is his name and nobody, high or low, connected with the New York Central railroad ever dared to call him 'Bill,' " said the Central offi-cial. "The late William H. Vanderbilt and Mr. Sims used to be together a great deal, simply because the Central road's affairs had to be looked after daily carefully. Mr. Sim's special work when Mr. Vanderbilt was busy signing documents was to put a blotter over the signature and set the papers aside carefully. He was as faithful a colored servitor as ever a millionaire had at his beck and call. But there came a day some years ago when Mr. Sims became indignant, says the New York World. It was when Mr. Depew was nominated for lieutepant-governor by the liberal re-publicans. A few days after the nomi-nation Mr. Depew took his seat at his desk, which was quite near a table where Mr. Vanderbilt, and Mr. Sims, too, were busy at work.
"Well, William, said Mr. Depew,

'are you going to vote for me?'
"Are you addressing yourself to me, sah?' exclaimed Mr. Sims, drawing himself up to his full height. The familiar term William was too much for him—he thought that Mr. Depew had probably addressed Mr. Vanderbilt. "'You are the gentleman," said Mr.

Depew. "Well, sah,' replied Mr. Sims, 'I am not going to vote for you, and any of my friends who do such a thing will lose my respect forever.'
"This outburst rattled even Mr. Vanderbilt, who let go of his pen for a min-ute. He and Mr. Depew exchanged glances, as much as to say, 'What does all this mean?'

"'Why will you not vote for me?" asked the candidate for lieutenant-gov-

"Because, sah,' exclaimed Mr. Sims, 'you are'n infamous traitor to yer party.'
"'We'll change the subject,' exclaimed Mr. Vanderbilt; 'there's evidently no unanimity here,' and he laughed heartily. Mr. Depew did not.

"To say that Mr. Depew felt somewhat backshelfed is only to tell the truth. Well, we all know, for reasons specified at that time, when he was a candidate, Mr. Depew did not become lieutenantgovernor of the great state of New "Time went by, a short time compara tively after the state and presidential contest had ended with the liberal republicans in the soup, when whole souled republicans of all stripes in the legislature, caucously nominated Mr. Deweese as a regent of the university of course a state office. This was chance for Mr. Depew to get even with Mr. William Sims.

"'You've heard Mr. Sims,' said he solemly, as he sat down to his desk one morning, 'that the republican party has nominated me for regent of the university.' Mr. Depow laid great stress on ity.' Mr. D pew maid great stress of the word republican. "'Certainly I've heard of it!' ex-claimed Mr. Sims as he put his blotter over a check for $210,000 that had just been signed by Mr. Vanderbilt. "I read the republican papers, sah. Mr. Sim's emphasis on republican was a perfect imitation of Mr. Depew's, and he couldn't help but wince. Mr. Vandercouldn t help but wince. Mr. Vander-bilt grinned hardly. As afterward said he enjoyed the scene immensely.

"'You would not vote for me, I supose, if you were in the legislature and had a vote as a republican. You know, Mr. Sims, you said you wouldn't vote for me for lieutenant-governor.
"'Mr. Depew,' exclaimed Mr. Sims as if he were reading a text from the scripture, 'you were out of the true fold then, and unworthy of the respect of any respectable citizen like me. Since then the Lord God Almighty has given you a change of heart, and the republican party has taken advantage of it. Am I right or am I wrong? They say that Mr. Vanderbilt nearly went under the table, he was so convulsed. Mr. Depew was filled with a violent fit of coughing. Mr. William Sim's smile was childlike and bland. Now the thing that has puzzled Mr. Depew from that day to this is, did he or did he not get even with Mr. William Sims. I leave the readers of the World to come to their own conclusion.'

WAS FAITHFUL TO HER WIFE Strange Story Brought Out by the Death of a Massachusetts Woman.

You have seen Orville Ranney. His white hair and youthful face are so striking that, unless you go through the world with your eyes shut, you must have asked his name, writes Edward S. Van Zile in the Chicago Herald. -You remember the tall, sad-faced man who walks up Broadway every afternoon at 4 and is sometimes seen at the opera. He has never courted notoriety, but his appearance is such that in spite of himself local fame has come to him. There are few who know his history. It is a sad one. He told me his story a few nights ago. Listen:

"I have always had a passion for old houses," began Ranney, as we sat puffing our after-dinner cigars at an up-town club. "I was born in one of those ancient mansions that still defy the wintry winds that beat across the eastern end of Long Island. It had been built by one of my ancestors in the seventeenth century and the family had lived there for many generations. As a boy I spent much time in the timber-ribbed attic f my birthplace, overhauling relies of the past and building castles in the air. Heigho, I wish I could be a boy again! I have visited the Alhambra and seen the Coliseum by moonlight, but the romance that surrounded my home-stead in my early years I shall never find again.

"As I said, 1 have always retained my love for those antique structures in which men of old stalked about in kneebreeches and frills, living, loving, hating, dying, in thee queer days before George Washington was born. It was that love that proved my ruin. The way of it was this:

"I was engaged to be married to one original flery condition. It seems not impossible that some of these early volcanoes may in the throes of their mighperfect woman—delicate, high-bred, affectionate, proud. I worshipped her, and when she promised to be my wife my joy was infinite.

"One day, not long before our "One day, not make a driving marriage, we were driving through Westchester county, a tradition and province rich in tradition and attractive to the eye. It was late in May and I was anxious to find a house where we could spend the summer. We were to be married early in June. Sud-denly I was struck by the charms of an ancient mansion that stood on a gentle ancient mansion that stood on a gentle hill overlooking Long Island sound. It was a large house, old-fashioned, rambling, picturesque. White Corinthian pillars supported the piazza and above the roof arose a peculiar conformation that indicated the Huguenot orgin of the first owner. A great lawn bedeeked with stately trees. great lawn, bedecked with stately trees, surrounded the old house and a dilapidated lodge at the entrance to the place was mournfully going to ruin. A sign on the gate informed the public that the house and grounds were "For Sale or

"To make a long story short, I leased the house for the season. On our return from our honeymoon my wife was astonished and delighted at the change which had been wrought in the ancient Hugue-not homestead. I had expended a large amount of money in placing the house and grounds in good order and my work-men had well fulfilled their task.

"It was with pardonable pride that I led my bride into our future home. She was delighted with the outcome of the orders I had left. A neglected rookery had been turned into a modern palace. There was still about the mansion an air of faded grandeur that pleased our antiquarian tastes, but to this was added those contemporary luxuries that wealth, well directed, can procure. The house, nearly two centuries old, seemed to wear its new adornments with patrician dignity. The whole place appeared to rejoice, in its quiet way, over its restoration to respect-

"Houses, especially those that have seen a great deal of life, acquire an individuality that is almost human. My wife and I, well do I remember, talked of this strange fact during our first dinner in our new home. We referred to the peculiar fascination that this deserted homestead had exerted over us when we first saw it, and rejoiced that we had given in to it. For it was a very pleasant place. The view of the sound through the windows of the dining room was entrancing and the incense of the growing summer added to our joy. O, my friend, how much there is in youth and hope and love! That evening was the culmination of my life. Though I lived a thousand years I could never again taste the bliss that was mine during those sacred hours when hand in hand my wife and I watched the rising moon as it kissed the waters of the sound and threw about us fantastic shadows. For all eternity that evening will be to me the pinnacle of joy, the highest altitude of human happiness.

"And now for the dark side of the screen. It was late that night before we retired. I had been asleep but an hour when I was aroused of a sudden by a cry that echoed from below; 'Help! Help!' "I jumped from the bed in affright. My wife was sitting upright, a look of terror on her face. 'Help! help!' again the awful sounds echoed through the house. Seizing my revolver, I rushed down stairs. I felt sure that in the hallway I would find a tragedy in play. There was no one there. I ran to the parlor. I was vacant. The dining room, too, wa empty. There was one room left, the library. As I opened the door again I heard that weird and thrilling cry: 'Help! help!' To my horror, this time the voice was my wife's. Rushing upstairs I fainted at the sight before me. "When I came to my senses an hour later the light in our night lamp was burning dimly. The wind had arisen, and on the shore behind the house the waters broke with an insistent sound. I arose feebly and approached the bed. My wife lay dead: upon her throat were the marks of mur derous hands. I staggered to a mirror. My hair had turned white. And now it the silent watches of the night I hear that ghastly cry: 'Help! Help!' I have not slept for many weeks. What the

A Charming Memory.

No improvement have been so marked, so signally perfect in attainment, in the last few years, as the numerous luxuries which have been introduced in transcontinental travel. Instead of harrowing recollections the tourist now has left to him when his journey is completed, a charming memory of perfect train service and palace dining cars. The arrangements this winter for dining cars on the Union and Southern Pacific roads is something far in advance of anything in that hitherto attempted.
