superstitious Indians believed that the white wolf was an evil spirit and had led the detered young hunter to destruction, and that for his ventursomeness he was doomed to ride in the chase forever. This betief became deep-rooted, so deep, in fact, that Bright Suar and her friends refused to believe the report that her lover was murdered by cowboys, and for the good of the story, it is well that they did not believe it, while they knew that Young Eagle was still riding hard after the wolf, yet the evil one had transferred. the evil one had transformed both the hunter and his pony into spirits, and in this form they were often seen by the superstitions Indians, riding on the trail that led to no-where. Sometimes the spirit of Eagle and his horse would fly along the prairries, and then again they would sear through the sky, but always in the same direction and always tient suffering of one of the inmates, a strangely and uncommonly beautiful Sioux maiden. She is not pretty or handsome, as on the same hopeless and endies chase after the white wolf. The ghostiv Eagle became known as the Spirit Hunter, and he could be seen and heard by the imaginative Indians, upon almost any dark night, trot, trot, along the trail, or whiz, whiz, through the clouds and air. The evil spirit seemed to take par-ticular delight in compeling the spirit of Young Eagle to ride hard and furious during thunder storms, and the Indians could hear and see in the thunder and lightning the report and flash of the Spirit Hunter's gun as he got within range of the object of his chase, and when the rumbling thunder and wind

mal led them a chase of many miles, until all becoming tired, gave it up, except Young Eagle, the lover of Bright Star. He declared his determination of following the white wolf if the chase led him on forever. They waited days, weeks and menths for the young hunter's return, but the chase still led him on. Months were followed by years, but the chase had not yet concluded, and then the chase went on. When the Messiah and ghost shirt craze roke out, Bright Star succeeded, to her own satisfaction, and in some inexplicable way as sociated the former with the spirit of her spirit of her lover, the ghostly rambow chaser, and she expected something to turn up-and it Bright Star had a father and brother who followed they could distinguish an evil laugh at the hunter's hopeless efforts, and the

were members of Big Foot's band of very hostile Indians, and whon they decided to go on the warpath, she followed them, and they ook up the march toward the bad lands. The young girl was a firm believer in the Messiah story, and one night while asleep in her father's tepee the spirit of Young Eagle came to her and told her that the Indians must be good and not fight the soldiers, or they would all be sent to the unhappy huntlag grounds to keep him company in his end-less chase. At the same time the spirit fool-ishly told her that he would protect her and that she was bullet-proof. It is said that Bright Star the next morning related her experience and admonished them to heed the spirit warning; but they were hungry for blood or beef and listened not to her story. When the Seventh cavalry and Lieutenant Hawthorne's detachment of artillery under Major Whitesiae overtook the band on December 28 and agrested Big Foot, Bright Star again warned the Indians not to resist, and also asked the soldiers not to harm her people or goad them into fighting. When they were marched to the fatal ground on Wounded Knee and surrounded the next morning by the joined forces under Colonel Forsythe and Taylor's scouts, with several Hotchkiss guns, Bright Star was in the front of her people, and watched every movement on both sides with anxiety, when the attempt was made to disarm the Indians she knew trouble was coming, but she was not concerned about herself for she had faith in the power of the Spirit Hunter to protect her, and her thoughts were only of her people. It is said that when the first shot was fired she sprang in front of her father to protect him. Alas, poor deluded girl! The father was killed by a bullet that passed through the body of his daughter, and six other cruel, merciless bullets pierced the body of the unfortunate girl before she fell. When that day's slaughter was completed

Bright Star was among the wounded that were removed to the agency hospitals— brought here to die—for no one over expected that she could survive a day. But she still lies upon her cot and suffers, patiently enduring the pain, and lives. She may recover, but it will be nothing short of a miracle, and perhaps her faith in her Spirit protector was not entirely misplaced. Bright Star is a prophetess. She warns her people against further hostilities against the white people, for she sees that Poor Lo's fighting days are over. She observes, and not altogether without a degree of sadness, that the chiefs that once were mighty in council and battle are mighty in council and battle are mighty no more, and the future glory of the warrior must be attained at the plow or other civilized pursuits. And how true are the observations of the Indian maiden! Of all the long line of Indian greatness, old Red Cloud is generally regarded as the latter end, and he is tottering upon the brink of his gruve. Macpeahleutah, as the old man is grave. Macpeahleutah, as the old man is called in the Ogalalla tongue, has of late years traveled much and was not slow to recognize the march of civilization. He told his followers that their only salvation from speedy and utter annihilation was peace, Some of the white people of his acquaintance have dubbed Red Cloud "the Indian Gladstone," and recent events have shown that the title was not altogether undescrived. Red the title was not altogether undeserved. Red Cloud has a son, known as Jack Red Cloud, not more than twenty-three or twenty-four years old, who has an ambition to be a big chief and a bad Indian, and he succeeded in giving the military not a little trouble in the late unpleasantness. But he is not made of the stuff that made his old father famous, and his appearance is that of a horse thief and gives a man the impression that he would stab an enemy in the back, but never in the breast

Then there is old Crow Dog, an old chief who is credited with leading the attack on Custer, now "doing chores" around his squaw's teped at the agency cutting wood and carrying the baby! And isn't this a fall for a once mighty chief—a warrior bold? Crow Dog curying the baby! A fall indeed.

ARTESIAN WELLS SUGGESTED

A New Water Supply for the Arid Land Belt of the State.

OPINIONS OF GEOLOGISTS SET FORTH,

No Reason Why Any Portion of Nobraska Should Not Have a Sufficient Quantity of Good Water.

One of the features of the present agitation of the irrigation question is the possibility of the use of artesian wells as a means of water supply in the so-called and regions of the west. So far as this pertains to Nebraska it seems quite certain that this state may depend implicitly to a large degree on the underground water supply. The geological formation of Nebraska is pecufiar, if the result of careful rescarches and investigations is to be believed. The surface of the state may for, comparison, be set down as a plane. From Sloux county, in the extreme northwest corner of the state, to Richardson county, in the southeast corner, this plane slopes from nearly five thousand feet above the sea level to only 1,000. The underlying stratagre, howover, bent in the form of a basin, the eastern edges being upturned at a considerable angle, while at the center is noted a dip in a marked degree from the plane of the surface, To have artesian wells in addition to water three other conditions are necessary.

(1) Is a porous stratum that will contain water, and this most be overlaid any un-derlaid by impervious strata. (2.) It must be accessible to percolating water at a height sufficient to give a pressure that will insure a flow at the surface at (3.) At the lower edge there must be interposed some obstacle offering sufficient resistance to prevent the outflow of the water, thus destroying the pressure. All these conditions are admirably present in Nebraska.

Without entering into a lengthy and perhaps abstruse disquisition on the scientific aspects of the case, it will suffice to say that undermeath the tertiary (which lies next to the surface in Nebraska), comes the cretaceous and then the carboniferous. The lower member of the cretaceous is the Dakota sand, a gravel eposit especially suitable to retain water, it lying between two impervious strata. It is exposed to percolating water at a height of about seven thousand feet, and is doubtless an inexhaustible reservoir. There is one great drawback to its use, and that is near the center of the state, it dips with the carboniferous to a depth in some the carboniferous to a depth in some places fully 1,000 feet below the sea level and about four thousand feet below the surface of the earth. This of course renders it imprac-ticable, but it is argued, and not without good cause, by geologists (among them Prof. Hicks of the state university), that there exists nu-merous anticlinals in the folds of the strata which will bring the Dakota send near enough the surface to make it available. The flowing wells at Lincoln, Brownville and Omaha mark the eastern artesian basin of Nebraska, and are on the eastern outcrop of the carboniferous In the western portion of the state, near the western upturn of the cretaceous is another artesian basin. In the cretaccous is another artesian basin. In the northern central part of the state is still a third basin, the result of tapping the tertiary. This is the basin to which Nebraska must look for water for artesian supply. While the flow from the wells in the castern basin, and in the western area on the Dakota sand is voluminated and reliable the uncertainty of tweether.

ous and reliable, the uncertainty of reaching the Dakota sand, although it underlies the western counties entire, places it out of consideration. In Nebraska at least 54,000 square miles, according to Prof. Hicks, are embraced in the catchment basin that contributes to the tertiary. Two and one-fourth trillions of cubic feet of water fall on this annually. This gathers in immense basins of sheetwater in the various members of the tertiary group. Ordinarily these water beds can be reached by boring from forty to 400 feet. Water readily rises in these wells, but its flow is hindered by valleys cutting off the level of the payments had and allowing the water to escape, preventing the genera-tion of sufficient pressure. Along the line of these valleys will be found springs. Prof. Hicks, as special geologist of the National agricultural department, made a careful ex-amination of the state's resources in this line and in his exhaustive report says:

"In order to have flowing wells from the tertiary rocks in western Nebraska the drill must penetrate to the level of porous beds considerably beneath the lowest valleys. There is no certainty of obtaining a flow if this should be done, but it is worth trying. The catchment area of the tertiary is enor-mous, and all the other conditions of abun-dant subterranean waters are fulfilled. The water-bearing stratum is usually gravel. The tertiary has numerous and extensive beds of gravel at different levels, and this forms an ideally perfect water carrier.

"The chance of Howing wells in the tertiary is not the only consideration respecting the supply of western Nebraska from subter-ranean sources. Supposing that the pressure shall not anywhere be found sufficient to make the water rise and flow out at the sur-face, the veins are near enough to be within easy reach of the pump. Artificial means of raising the water have been brought to such perfection that the necessity of pumping is not an insuperable obstacle to the economic use of the water.

"The supply is practically inexhaustible. Thousands of cattle are often watered from a single well. Large towns obtain their supply for all purposes from a single well. The strength of the underflow is shown by the springs also, since they arise from the cutting of the water bearing beds by the erosion of the valleys. Fort Robinson requires 50,000 gallons of water daily for its garrison. This is supplied from a single spring without seeming to exhaust one-half of its capacity. Another spring on the military reservation near Crawford flows at the rate of 90,000 gallons per day. The big spring on the North Loup, in Blaine county, rises from the bottom of the river with such force as to make a large dome-shaped elevation in the current.

"Another evidence of the vast amount of the underflow is the constant and large volume of rivers in the region of tertiary rocks. The Loup rivers carry a great amount of water and never rise or fall much in the wet-test or dryest weather. That they are fed test or dryest weather. That they are fad by the underflow is apparent from the numerous springs at their sources and at many points along their valleys. The sandhills are great reservoirs of maisture. The rain falling upon them sinks at once to such depths as to be practically out of reach of evaporation, and thence feeds the springs and rivers. The lagoons on the table lands also collect much righters. and rivers. The lagoons on the table lands also collect much infoistare and deliver it to the underflow. There are about forty flowing wells in Holt county which obtain their supply from rocks still newer than the tertlary. They range from forty to 185 feet in depth. The water rises thirty feet above the surface in some cases and flows at the rate of twelve and one half callons per minute. twelve and one-half gallons per minute

"The underflow in the valleys of the large rivers is a striking phenomen The invisible Platte is greater than the visible, and its waters are purer because they have passed through a natural filter composed of miles of sand and gravel. The towns and cities in the valley of the Piatte are supplied from the buried river which flows beneath their sites. The quality is excellent and the quantity in-exhaustible. The question of possible con-tamination from the surface should not be overlooked in the location of the wells."

This encourages the belief that a mean will yet be devised to make available the im-mense rainfall of the state, which now is allowed to drain away through the sub-strata of the state, and use it for the natural pur-pose of aiding in growing crops. Artesian wells are not the least important features of irrigation, and the local zoological features of overy community removed from an abundant supply of surface water, should be carefully considered. A study may develop the fact that a pientiful water supply lies not far be-neath the surface, and can be reached for a
