Clarks People Expected Something Sensational From the Cowles Jury. THEY THINK THEY KNOW THE MURDERER. Some Remarkable Evidence Brought Out at the Inquest—A Talk With the Husband of the Dead Woman.

CLARKS, Neb., Feb. 14.—[Special Telegram to THE BEE.]—The verdict of the coroner's jury in the Cowles murder case, that Mrs. Cowles was killed by a man of unknown parol, was a great surprise to everybody here, as it was understood that the finding would be very sensational, and would at once be followed by the arrest of the suspected party.

Although the inquest was held behind closed doors, the jurors made no effort to conceal that several very damaging facts, as yet unexplained, were introduced in evidence, but the law was construed to read that the deceased must have come to her death at the hands of persons unknown or of some particular party, and inasmuch as the case would have to go before a higher tribunal in any event, they were unwilling to shoulder unnecessary responsibility.

One of the most mysterious evidence in the case is the fact that the broken window of the Cowles residence was forced with a hatchet taken from the barn, the imprint on the sill fitting the weapon exactly even to a broken corner. The mark in the soft wood was as perfect as if made in putty, and a microscopic examination rendered this fact more certain.
