Scribes of Other Days. "I was reading in THE SUNDAY BEE," said an ex-newspaper man, "an article on the advance of Omaha journalism the past dozen years and was forcibly reminded thereby of the great changes wrought within that time. Then in thinking the matter over and contemplating the journalistic strides in those dozen years the mind reverted to a period covering a decade previous to that time and how daily newspaper work was carried on in Omaha in those days.

"Then two men covered a field where scores are now employed, and I have in mind the case of one man-Major Bird, of the Daily Republican, who for a time did all the editorial and city writing, com-passed the entire proof-reading and followed it up with addressing and mailing all the out-of-town mail. I think, too, the major assisted in folding the papers, but of this I am not quite certain. These manifold duties kept him pretty busy, but between times he managed to secure enough sleep to enable him to stand up under the strain for many months. The major drifted from Omaha to Sacramento, and was engaged in editorial work in that city several years previous to his death.

"Then there was a Mr. Wilson of Philadelphia—imported direct, I think, by Dr. Miller of the Herald—who alone edited the city page of that paper, attended to revision of the telegraph, making headings, reading proof,

The Herald was a ten-column folio in those days, and to get up three or four columns of local news each day for the big fourth page, in addition to the other duties mentioned, was no easy task. Wilson, however, was a rapid writer, an adept news-gatherer, and from day to day be accomplished the work with apparent case. Of course telegraph reports at that time were not one-tenth as large

"But as I said before, Wilson was from Philadeiphia, where he had been engaged in newspaper work, and ne could and did give us westerners many points how to get up a newspaper in a readable and attractive manner. His first innovation was to arrange the telegraph news under proper headings, sub-headings, etc., something that had been en-tirely neglected previous to his coming. Criminal, accidental, political, foreign, etc., were arranged under appropriate headings, and over the whole was placed a 'slug head' big enough to please the most avaricious compositor, and to make him think that Wilson was the best-newspaper man this far west. Before the Philadelphia journalist struck the town there had been no heads put on the telegraph, and the only revision it got came from the compositor as he put the mean in type. Whole columns were dumped in the forms with its single line, 'Latest by Telegraph,' over the whole, and as the printers were more interested in the length of their string of dupes than they were in presenting an intelligible report, you can safely calculate that the telegraph columns did not read as smooth as in these later days. Wilson worked a great change—one that met the approbation of the printer, suited the general reader, and pleased Dr. Miller-so much so that he complimented the new city editor on his work, as he was wont to do any man who labored on his paper and rendered good service. "I spoke of the 'slug heads' that Wilson put over the telegraph news, and I meant to tell you that he was the first man to make that sort of a head in an Omaha newspaper. They came when he came and have remained ever since. First the telegraph news was thus made prominent, and soon after important tocal articles were served in like manner. A series of articles on the Omaha schools writ-ten by Wilson were treated with sensational headings, and attracted much attention thereby. It was a departure from the monotony of police court reports, army news, rail road intelligence, etc., with which the col-umns had previously been burdened, and created a good impression for the paper that had the energy to go as far away as Philadelphia for literary talent. "But Wilson, with all his talent and the valuable newspaper experience he was able to bring from the Quaker City, did not last long in the hustling Omaha of those days. He had a penchant for lecturing in connection with his manifold newspaper duties, and as Dr. Miller naturally wanted a man whom he paid a liberal salary to give his undivided attention to the Heraid columns, the brilliant young journalist of Philadelphia at the end of a few months' service returned to his first love and again took up the work he abandoned to seek fame and fortune in the far west. "Yes there has, as stated in THE BEE's article to which I referred in the outset, been great changes in the manner of conducting newspapers in Omaha in the past twenty years. The city in that time has made great years. strides, but the newspapers have kept equal pace, if they have not exceeded the progress and prosperity witnessed on every hand. As an evidence look at the metropolitan-appear-ing, widely circulated and ably managed Dairy Beg, with its ponderous presses, scores of writers, army of printers, bosts of carriers, and last, but not least, the finest publication structure in the country, built up and made permanent in the dozen or fifteen years. One who is not familiar with its early history, of the disad-vantages under which it labored at the start, cannot appreciate the magnitude of its great ness at this time. To properly understand the success and prominence attending its publication he must go back to the days when it first came before the public as a little give-away sheet, with no plant of its own, for midable opposition from the old-established papers, beset by fire and fiend and hampered all possible ways that the end of its days might be soon numbered. But it triumphed over all obstacles and is today a living empodiment of the determination and energy of the man whom everybody knows to be at its

FOOTPRINTS IN THE SNOW.

How They Fixed the Crime of Murder Upon Willard Randall.

EX-COURT REPORTER'S RECOLLECTIONS.

Judge Neville, General Strickland and Ex-Congressman Connell as District Attorney - Baldwin's Counterfeit Bi l.

Judge James Neville came to Omaha soon after the close of the war, in which he bore an active part, being mustered out as captain of his company. His first employment here was as a clerk to copy legal papers in the office of Strickland & Haxby, but so much difficulty was experienced in digging out the hidden mysteries of the copies aforesaid that the firm was compelled to do something in self-defense, and so be was promoted to a partnership and another man hired to wield the pen. Later on he was appointed United States district attorney for Nebraska, which office he filled for eight years and in 1879 was made judge of this district.

While on the bench Judge Neville estabished an honorable reputation. He was patient and conscientious in the hearing of cases and always actuated by a desire to render exact justice to litigants. As prosecuting attorney in the United States court he was too sympathetic in his nature to be a terror to evil doers to any marked degree and he was always ready to make full allowance for the weaknesses of human in dealing with violators of the law. On one occasion, upon coming into court with a big bundle of indictments, he remarked to a prominent member of the Omaha bar: "Now, here are three packages; these (in dicating one of the packages) I intend to try; these (indicating), to continue, and these to

It happened that the attorney had been e m ploved by one of the indicted unfortunates and hence was interested in learning just how his client was affected by this sorting out of papers. As they were left lying on the table for a few moments he examined them and skillfully slipped the indictment in which he was concerned from the bundle marked "trial" to that labelled "nolle," and was much pleased to hear his case read out by district attorney Neville among those he desired dismissed. Then he skipped out into the corridor where his anxious client was pacing up and down, and told him to "jump the town' at once, which advice was acted upon. In the afternoon Mr. Neville announced that he wished to take up this particular case, and the defendant's counsel was asked by Judge Dundy if he was ready for trial. The lawyer replied, with much astonishment, that at the morning session his client was on hand with a cloud of witnesses fully prepared to prove his innocence, but that, hearing his case called with those the district attorney wished to dismiss, he supposed that ended it and had at once left town. Mr. Ne-ville explained that he had placed that indict, ment in the wrong package by mistake and that he was very anxious to try the case. As the dreadful crime of the defendant consisted in cutting a few trees on government land, and he had already been put to great ex-pense and auxiety, the court concluded the man had been sufficiently punished, and the dismissal was allowed to stand.

During the past few years Judge Neville has made investments in Omaha real estate with such discretion that he is now enjoying an annual income of about $30,000. He owns property opposite the corners of the new postoffice site, and frankly confesses that the selection of that particular block increased the value of his adjoining property at least $50,000. The late Silas A. Strickland was Judge Neville's predecessor as United States district attorney and for a quarter of a century was a prominent character in Nebraska politics. He first located at Bellevue, about 1854, and in 1855 was appointed by Judge r'enner F'er-guson (father of Judge Arthur N. Ferguson) clerk of the territorial court for this district. He represented Douglas county in the legislature in 1857. At the beginning of the war hattre in 1857. At the beginning of the war he enlisted as a private in the First Ne-braska infantry, became adjutant of the regi-ment, then colonel of the Fifteenth Ohio in-fantry, achieving special distinction at the battle of Perryville, Ky., and returned home at the close of the war with the rank of brig-adier general by brevet. Of the constitu-tional convention of 1871 he was the president and brought to the performance of the duties of that position a degree of vigor, tact, energy and good nature which was always effective. As a lawyer he relied more upon his power with a jury-in which respect he had few equals—than upon being a master of obstruse legal points. He usually began the trial of a case with an abundance of paper for taking notes of testimony (of which, as a matter of fact, he never used a full sheet), a clean handkerchief and a pack-age of peppermint candy, all of which he would place on the table behind him, to find, a few moments later, than his package of candy was being passed around among the lawyers for free distribution. In a trial in the United States court where a young man had been indicted for passing a counterfeit $10 bill, the counsel of the latter, C. A. Baldwin, esq., objected to General Strickland's course in endeavoring to prove by business men the fact that the bill in question was a counterfeit, but to no purpose. Finally, improving a favorable chance, Mr. Baldwin substituted a good bill for the counterfeit, which genuine money General Strickland then proved by three business men to be the rankest kind of counterfeit. Thereupon Mr. Baldwin vehemently demanded that attention be given to his objections and Judge Dundy insisted that the district atterney send out for a back cachier. district attorney send out for a bank cashier as an expert. With great confidence Gen-eral Strickland handed to the expert the bill -after establishing his business and his ex-perience in handling money and said: "State to the jury whether, in your opinon, that bill is good or bad?" This is a good bill, sir," returned the wit-What!" shouted the attorney, "do mean to say that bill is not a counter feit;

"Yes, sir; if you will bring it down to the Omaha National bank we will give you the rold for it." Then there was a scene, in the midst of which Mr. Baldwin managed to explain to the court that he had chanced bills without the knowledge of the district attorney, and that in view of the fact that three good business men had testified that a genuine bill was a counterfeit, he thought considerable allowance should be made for his client—an allowance should be made for his client—an ignorant country boy—in mistaking a counterfeit for a good bill. The jury were evidently impressed with the idea, for they returned a verdict of acquittal.

W. J. Connell established a fine record as district attorney of the state court during his term which began in January, 1875. In the fall of that year he prosecuted Willard Randall, indicted for the murder of a young woman at Fontenelle, Washington county, under circumstances of the most atrocious character. Randall was only about eighteen years of age and had previously borne so good a reputation that previously borne so good a reputation that his assertions of innocence were at first gen-erally believed. The proof against him was entirely circumstantial, an old pair of rubber overshoes with a deep mark across the soles, caused by putting them against a hot stove-hearth, forming an important link in the chain of testimony. Tracks were found in the fresh snow leading from the road to the house where the woman had been left alone that day, and these tracks had a mark preisely fitting those in the soles of Randali's noes. The first trial was held at Blair where he jury disagreed but on the second trial seld in Omaha, Mr. Connell secured a con-riction and Randall was sentenced to a term the country, in a wagon. As appeal was taken to the supreme court and a new trial was granted, when Melton was found guilty of murder in the second degree and sentenced by Judge Savage to a term of ten years im-prisonment. In both of these cases Mr. Con-tween friends.

It has been said that a person may be more truly judged by the books and papers he reads than by his associates: for one's companions may be, for the time, thrust upon him, whereas his reading is the result of choice. Some people read a great many books that they do not own and others own many books they do not read. The person of decided literary fastes usually know his erary tastes usually knows his library erary tastes usually knows his Borary through and also reads a great deal outside of his own book shelves. Books constantly before the eyes in the library at home are a perpetual invitation to seek information and while the tides of fortune and sentiment may while the tides of fortune and scatiment may ebb and flow the immortal writings of Shake-speare, Milton, Byron, Pante, Irving, Haw-thorne, Emerson, Bacon, Dickens, Coleridge, Tennyson, Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Hol-mes, Harriet Beccher Stowe and a host of others will remain the same substantial com-panions and friends.

There are not many people in Omaha who have a better appreciation of good literature than Dr. George L. Miller, although he has been too busy a man most of his life to devote much time to reading outside of newspapers and the current topics of the hour. His library at his beautiful country seat in Seymour park, one of the most delightfu suburbs of Omaha, is not remarkable for the great number of volumes but the selection is, for all practical purposes, most excellent, Or. Miller knows thoroughly every book he has on his shelves and if he had not, years ago, gotten into the very generous but expensive habit of giving his books away and leading them to almost everybody who wished to borrow he would certainly have had a magnificent array of choice volumes.

Speaking of his own library the other day Dr. Miller said: "I have no library worth mentioning, because I have not been a literary man. I spent too many years in the capacity of a busy editor to have become engrossed in literature. What I have I have read and re-read and I have given away more books than I have in my library. I never bought a book that I did not want to use and many of the most valuable volumes I ever owned have been seattered here and there and i shall never see them again. I have two special treasures in my library. These are the works of Irving and Hawthorne, I am passionately fond of those two books and would not part with them under any consideration. I never had any desire to fill my library with quantities of books about which knew nothing, simply as a matter of show. I make a practical use of my library. When I make a practical use of my library. When I want to know something about a scientific point or a question in philosophy or natural history I go through everything I have in my library bearing upon that subject and I make the knowledge that the beoks contain a part of my own metal resources to such an extent, at least, the I shall know just where to lay my fingers the thing when I want it again.

"But I am not a literary man. There are very few literary people in Omaha or the very few literary people in Omaha or the very few literary people in on the very few literary people in the state of the very few literary people in the state of the very few literature and ancientlore, and then time and application to receive a very literature and ancientlore, and then time and application to receive a very literary people of the very literary peopl application to produce a real literary person.
"I remember two very eminent illustra-tions of the point I mentioned a moment ago with regard to buying books as a matter of show and buying them as a means of real literary attainment. One was Stephen A. Douglas and the other was Samuel J. Til-den. Douglas had an immense array of fine books; magnificent book cases filled with handsomely bound volumes that were not disturbed from one end of the year to the other. Douglas was not a book man and the larger part of his library had never been read by the owner.

"Mr. Tilden was entirely different. He was a reader of wonderfully fine taste and in-satiable thirst. In addition to this he pos-sessed one of the most retentive memories I ever knew. He seemed to be able to call up at will any one in that varied and stupendous array of volumes in his library and find in it exactly the quotation he had in mind. I once exactly the quotation he had in mind. Tonce visited Mr. Tilden, taking with me Senator Paddock, who had besome an admirer of the sage of Grammercy Park, but had never to him. When I introduced Senator Paddock Mr. Tilden repeated the name and the said: 'Wait a moment. I want to tell Mr. Paddock something about his ancestry. John bring me volume — in case —. When the re-quired volume was handed to our host he turned deliberately to a certain page and read us several pages about Senator Paddock's tather and grandfather. 'You see I know something about your ancestry,' said Mr. Tilden, smiling, as he laid down the book and then branched out into one of those conversations that were a combined spell ociability and intellectual comfort to the Dr. Müller is particularly fond of scientific works and the best authorities upon natural history. He has a choice array of poetl-cal works and works of fiction. His Shakespeare is magnificently illustrated and is in small volumes of beautiful typography, restsmall volumes of beautiful types and full to the eyes and convenient to hold when reading.
