

A DAY IN BEAUTIFUL VERONA.

An Omaha Girl's Impressions of the Historic Italfan City.

THE TOMBS OF ROMEO AND JULIET.

Picturesque Costumes of the Natives—Buffalo Bill Well Known There—Politeness and Generosity of Italy's Sons.

VERONA, Italy, Nov. 10.—Our guide is Verona was a jovial, laughing young man, who lived upon the few lire he could extract from the foreign tourist, by showing him the principal sights, and giving information on the monuments. He had traveled some, had spent a year or two in Germany, and had learned enough, in that language, to make himself understood. The Italian has always an eye to business, and is ever awake to an opening for himself. The Germans are traveling very much now in Italy, and an intelligent interpreter, who is anxious to serve them, during a day's sightseeing, can earn several francs per day in such capacity if he but watch his chance at the station upon arrival of the express trains. The cicerone who approached us, and politely offered us his services had all the beautiful qualities of face, quick perception, and grace of manner which one is accustomed to seeing in this lovely nation of the south. His appearance and refinement of manner at once predisposed us in his favor. We engaged him on the spot and started off on our tour of the city. Giovanni, for this was his name, set his bat-jointly on one side of his head, gave an extra twirl to his black mustache, and, with an air of pride begot by success, started us off victoriously.

Once within the walls of the town, we felt ourselves again in Italy. Following a long stretch of strew were men and boys lying on the ground, under a burning sun. Bare-headed women in gay colored dresses stood at their fruit stalls crying their wares. Here were pyramids of great green watermelons, piled high like cannon balls, limes and lemons, figs green and purple, rose-colored peaches, golden apricots and white grapes, all in tempting banks before us. Water carriers with their cans of ice and aqua prisa went about cooling their drink, while dark eyed children with dark olive skins played at games around the picturesque groups. Giovanni smiled as we passed the scene and asked if we liked his people. Our reply satisfied him, for surely if the forester could return to his country for the sixtieth time there would be no lack of friends and relations. Once away from the chattering fruit sellers, I suggested to our guide that we wished to see, before all else, the tombs of Romeo and Juliet and the house of the Capulets. "Sì," he knew this of course, all the English wished it, and no word take us there at once.

"Ah! Gott! how often have I shown these, and that widow where Juliet talked with her lover?" He had closed his eyes, and I almost expected to see him weep, but I was mistaken, for the next second his expression had brightened up to the thought of something else not in the least pathetic. "Buffalo Bill" has been here, he gave three performances in the arena, and, but I wouldn't swear, was wounded, for we were wounded. Yes, wounded for I was in Verona on my way to lay my flower at Juliet's shrine, and here was America's most prominent citizen coming to take the place of sentiment. It was nothing short of sacrilege; it was cruel, it was impudent, it was impudent to ask, hoping to change the current of his thoughts and eager to pass on toward the cave.

"No, the window alone remains; the balcony has fallen. Buffalo Bill gave 5,000 lire for the use of the arena, and made 30,000 lire for the R. A. Good business investment."

What madness seized me at that moment! I wished to cast him from me into the river we were crossing, or throw him into the same area which no insisted upon reciting.

"The buffaloes and Indians were fine, and the bronze horses which would not go"—and, as the vision of the bucking ponies flashed across his mind, he gave me to see an infant, riding a large, that it was impossible not to join in it. Yet, on top, I was firm. I would not listen to another word about a certain important personage. My entire attention was held by Juliet, whose house and home were open to us; I was willing to have my mind disturbed by conflicting elements. The balcony scene was before me in imagination, and I could picture Romeo in all the beauty of his southern home talking sweet words believed.

The arena is in a fine state of preservation, and from it can be obtained an excellent idea of the old Roman amphitheaters. The tiers of stone seats extend the entire circumference of the building, and the roof, which has been well done, which is, unfortunately, not always the case with these ancient monuments. The people in Verona believe in utilizing the theater and thereby get some revenue. This is the idea in view in various sorts of open-air performances are given here, and it was thus that the surprising American showman was able to secure the historical spot for three performances.
