THE BOSS SWINDLER.

Demise of Boston's Female Napoleon o Crooked Finance.

The death in Boston of Sarah E. Howe, says the Chicago Post, recalls one of those careers so disheartening to ontimists who seek to convince themseives that as the world grows older it grows wiser, and as the means of education are diffused the educated are less susceptible to the wiles of vulgar and greedy adventurers. It was the press, the vulgar prosaic press, that opened the eyes of the Boston minervas to their own folly and brought the law to bear upon the swindler. The press continually renders such service to an ungrateful people. Mrs. Howe was seized, but when the eye of the press was withdrawn from her case she was virtually able to defeat the law. "On the afternoon of her arrival I gave a little dinner to a few of my professional friends and felt particularly anxious to have the affair smoothly. With this end in view Maria was put through a little preliminary drilling beforehand, in the course of which she in maged to smash the fish platter of a valuable set of china and display the fact that she didn't know any more about waiting on a table than she did of writing comic songs in Sanscrit. The guests arrived, and in fear and trembling I took my seat. We prepared for the preliminary oysters. They aid not come. I thumped the bell without eliciting a response from the non-evident Maria. Then I breathed her name softly, but in vain; I breathed it again, same result; and finally I reached for upper C and called 'Maria!' in tones that rattled the plates. "A capped and beribboned head thrust itself around the corner of the dining room door, and in tones of calm inquiry the young lady from the west remarked Did anybody holler? I thought I heard a yell."

They Are at the Front in Larger Numbers Now Than Ever Before. The young man who hesitates to accept or assume stations of responsibility and trust because of his youthfulness, says the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle, and waits for the dignifying and solidifying influence of maturer years to fit him for the position, is not a close student of the lives of men who have impressed their names on their country's history. While older men shake their heads and mark in balt complaining tones that boys know more than their fathers these days, yet from no source does the ambitious, determined young min teceive more cordial encouragement and support than from these same men who declare they are being shelved for the boys. is not that youth knows more than age. But when a youth, buoyant with hope and confidence, his vision undimmed by the doubts and prejudices eagendered by long acquaintance with the world, his ambition not withered by years of dreary struggle for subsistence, his heart full of love for humanity and his soul vibrant with the grand possibilitles of life-when such a youth, fresh from study and with intellect well stored, can mount at once to the point reached by his father through years of bitter experience, and from this vantage ground begin the battle of life, he is the better equipped of the two, just as a "dwarf perched upon the shoulders of a giant can see further than the giant." Those youths who think young men have not a fair chance, and those older men who think young men not able to fill important stations, may each learn a

Late in the afternoon the management was notified that the gentleman who had been accustomed to portray the fighting Gaul in the arena scene succumbed to the grip and wouldn't be around that evening. After an hour or so of sharp hustling for a substitute, a Milesian of diminutive proportions was secured, and there being no opportunity for a rehearsal he was told in a general way what to do and informed that he was to give up the ghost when the star told him to do so. When the evening came the stage manager and his assistant rigged up the volunteer in breastplate and helmet, gave him his little tin sword, and at the proper moment turned him loose in the arena. The star opened the combat by giving his antagonist a lively crack in the ribs. This roused the latter's Celtic blood and he retaliated by whacking the star's helmet in good gladiatorial fashion. Pleased by this display of enthusiasm on the part of a tyro, Spartacus smote the fighting Gaul in the neck by way of encouraging the same, and received a sharp jab in return.
