SHORTY LOCHINVAR.

R. L. Ketchum in the Argonaut.

I think it may be stated, without fear of successful contradiction, that at no period of a man's existence does Cupid's dart strike so deeply and cause so much sleeplessness as at the age of one score, or thereabout. I have known quite a number of young men of about that age to be deeply, passionately, desperately in love, and ultimately to recover and go through similar but less agonizing experiences several times thereafter. But, as I said, they never, in a single instance, suffered half so much from subsequent attacks as from that first experience. Not that they love less, but their capacity for suffering has diminished-which is something to be thankful for, for a man who could suffer at each recurrence of the complaint as much as he did at the first would die of the second or third relapse. The victim of this first attack is a pitiable creature, particularly when there are "obstacles," which is usually the case.

I always feel very sorry for a chap in this sort of a pickle, and I felt partic-ularly sorry for poor Shorty Fleming. I knew I ought not to encourage him, but he was such a good little beggar, and so much in earnest, that I would have deied a far more severe man than his brother Jack for his sake. Besides, Shorty was not one of the chaps who get over anything easily, and I knew failure would go hard with him. Moreover, Jack was not the only "obstacle." Sam Parker, Shorty's Nettie's papa, also objected. He was not a stern, unreasona-ble parent, by any means, but his ob-jections, even if presented goodnatured-ly, were none the less formidable. Par-ker was a shrewd Maine Yankee, with a total disbelief in the ability of woman-kind to use reason, and a record of some sixty years of devotion to an earnest hustle for the fascinating but elusive American dollar. Nettie was the only daughter and the youngest child in a family of soven, and the old man, close-fisted as he was, had spared no expense in educating her liberally. It was only natural, therefore, for him to object, es-pecially as Nettie was barely eighteen, and has only been out of school, a few months.

He called on Jack one afternoon, not casually, as he usually called, on his way to or from town, but with a direct purpose. Jack was under the weather, and lay on the sofa. I was reading to him when Parker walked in. "Howdy, Flemin', laid up, air ye? Howdy, Faber; purty warm, ain't it? Thanks, I will set a spell." And he sat down on the edge of a chair and began tracing figures on the floor with his big spur. He seemed nervous, and I rose to leave the room, but he waved his hand and said: "Set down, Faber. Set still. Guess I ain't got nothin' t' say but what ve mout ez well hear." Here the old man stiffened up in his seat and stated the object of his mission, in a good natured, but thoroughly decided way, closing with: "Naow, Flemin". 1 ain't no 'bjection to th' leetle feller-not one mite; he's a tiptop good boy an' all that. But 'tain't in reason th't I'm goin' t'spend more'n three thousan' dollars eddicatin' a young un', an' then let 'er go an' marry 'nother young 'un 'thout ary red. An' that's what it'll come tew, fust thing we

Now, Parker's remarks were in the nature of a revelation to us. Of course we knew Shorty had put in a good many evenings at the Parker ranch, but we had never guessed that his visits there had any significance. A courtship, too, with six big brothers loating around is a difficult matter. It is easy enough to fall-just fall-in love with a girl if there is no one to hinder. But with six father's wishes, when he had done much for her.

Sam Parker must have heard of this interview, and made up his mind to do something. Although he was usually so good-natured, he was as determined as a bull dog, and I thing he used some influence in deciding matters, for, two weeks later, he "dropped in" to tell Jack that Nettie and Cottrell would be married on Thanksgiving day, two months later.

Shorty must have seen the news in my face, for, after supper, he drew me aside and asked what I knew. I hated to tell him, but did so, the best way I could. The poor lad stood still as stone for several seconds. Then, with a shuddering sob, he turned away. In the morn-ling he was gone, with his horse and clothes, leaving no word. Jack and Joe, the other brother, were much worried, but, as Jack now for the first time acknowledged, "the boy could take of himself."

take of himself. Jack and I talked it over during the day, and he expressed a great deal of re-gret, thinking, however, that Nettie had decided for herself, and that Shorty had no one to blame for his failure. "It it had been different," he went on, "and Percy had persevered and won, I would have given in, and I think Parker would too, for next year Percy will come into about $15,000. You see, I've never told him of it, because I wanted him to grow up on his merita and be self-reliant. I think it has been for the best. Joe never knew, until he was of age, that he had anything, and we didn't tell Percy of it then, because he was only seventeen. Joe put his money into the ranch here and kept quiet about it." He sat silent for a minute, then continued: 'O' course, this is between our-selves. But-do you know, I wish the boy had won. He's a good deal of a boy had won. He's a good deal of a man, and, now I come to think of it, the affair has hit him hard. They could have waited a couple of years, you know." And Jack walked off slowiy, taking long whiffs at his pipe. Several weeks passed, during which

I saw Nettie Parker several times. She seemed different. Her laugh was not the jolly laugh I had been accustomed to hear, and she scened pensive at times. Was it her approaching wed-ding, or—Shorty? I hoped it was Shorty. But, somehow, when people pine they seem to lose color and get thin, and Nettie Parker did neither. And still no word from Shorty, and the day for the wedding only a week away. It was Wednesday of Thanksgiving week, and there had been great preparations at Parker's. The people for miles around had been invited to the weading, which old Sam "lowed" would be "th' bang-uppest thing iney ever hed in th' kentry." I rode into town to buy, on behalf of Jack and myself, something to present to the brideelect. In the postoffice, some one tapped me on the shoulder. I turned. It was Shorty Fleming-Shorty, with a handsome mustache, and smiling quite happily.

"How long before you're going out?" he asked. "Right now."

"Bully! Faber, go and borrow a horse until tomorrow-tell 'em yours is lame, and you'll have to lead him. Nobody has recognized me back of this overcoat collar and the hirsute adornment, and I don't want 'em to. "I'll walk out and head up the road. Hurry up with the horses."

In about twenty minutes I was follow-ing him, riding a horse I had borrowed from my friend the doctor, and leading my own. I soon caught up with Shorty. and we hurried on. Shorty showed me a letter signed "Nettie," and proceeded to unfold a plan he had in mind, which, for the quality of pure "nerve," I had never heard surpassed.

There was nobody at the house but Manuel, the cook, and Shorty soon had him sworn to silence, after which he proceeded to camp in the cold little upstairs store room off my den, where no-body could find him. Jack was not to know of his presence, he said, "because Jack is so thundering honest and persnickety, and would squall or spoil the job." * . . The half-hundred guests at Parker's Thad been enjoying hanksgiving day to the full. All of Mrs. Parker's good things had been stowed away where they would do the most good. The minister from town was getting ready for the ceremony, and the guests were bustling about, amid some confusion, trying to find the best points for observation. Nettic Parker, pale for once, stood near the front door, pulling her fingers nervously, waiting, supposedly, for her father. Some one knocked at the door. Nettie pulled it open, gave a little cry, grabbed a man's hat from the back of a chair and an overcoat from a peg near by, and rushed out, slamming the door. Everybody who saw the performance stood still, dazed. Then, as we heard horses' hoofs clattering up the road, there was a rush for the outside. Up the road, disappearing fast, were two horses, whose riders were evidently in a hurry. There was mother rush—this time for the stables—led by old Sam Parker. But, somehow, the doors would not open. They had been mailed up, very securely, by a person who was at that moment making hypocritical efforts to get one of them open. When they finally succeeded in mount-ing two or three men for pursuit, the runaways had three or four miles start. At this juncture, Cottrell, as cool as if he had never thought of attending his own wedding, came up and spoke quietly to old man Parker, who was so dazed that he had not opened his mouth so far. The old man started. "By gorry, Morris, mebbe that's c'rect. No use yowlin' over spilt milk. Come on boys." And they rode off, but not very rapidly. "I told the old gentleman," remarked Cottrell to me, as we turned toward the house, "that it was no use trying to head them off. They'll be married inside of an hour." Then, in a tone that enter-tained no trace of bitterness, he continued: "It is far better to have happened now than-than later. And-as it is-I think maybe there will be only one unhappy person, instead of three." That was Morris Cottrell-philosopher and man. Mr. and Mrs. Percival Fleming were met at the justice's office by old Sam Parker, who remarked: "Wa-al, I swow! Yew air a nervy boy! Ain't ya both ashamed on't?" No, they were not; and, after Nettie had had a good cry in her father's arms, the runaways were escorted back to the Parker ranch to receive the congratula-tions of their friends, foremost among whom was Morris Cottrell.

oung men, with whom one is on good terms, sitting around and occupying a large portion of one's attention, it is a matter of getting in love, which, accomplished, is rather more serious than a mere fall into the same.

Fleming sat up and ran his fingers through his hair gravely. Then: "I quite agree with you, Mr. Parker. I don't know what to say to Percy, but I will try a little strategy and see if he can be kept at home more. If that won't do, I can talk to him."

And here began my connection with Shorty's love affair. That evening I was writing busily when some one opened the door to my den and walked in. It was Shorty. He sat down quietly and took un a puper which he looked at and took up a paper, which he looked at for several minutes, while I scratched away at my work. Then he threw the paper down suddenly and turned to me with: "Faber, what was old Parker here for today?"

I tried to dissemble, but Shorty is no body's fool, and interrupted: "O, rot!" said he; "I reckon you think I'm a sucker. Now honestly, what was he here

Finally, I told him about the conversation between his brother and Parker He was silent for several minutes. could see his face twitch, Then he turned his face toward me and said, slow ly: "Faber, I know I'm young and all that, but-I know my own mind. Jack's a good brother and feels in duty bound to take care of me, but I guess I can 'tend to that myself. I-I've made up mp mind to marry that girl, if she'll have me, and all the Jacks and Sam Parkers in the world can't stop me." And Mr. Percival Floming set his mouth and walked out. He called at Parker's the next morning despite Jack's "strategy."

There was another caller at Parker's that evening, in the person of Morris Cotroll, a wealthy rancher from up the "Five-Mile." Shorty, when he got home, mentioned this fact to me, with some feeling in his tones. Cotroll was no old duffer. He was a man of 30, wellread, and a gentleman, and the prospec of having him for a rival would have sent despair to the heart of any penni-less young man less determined than Shorty Fleming. For two or three months Shorty continued his calls at Parker's, growing more and more gloomy and savage as the days went by, for old Sam Parker was something of a strategist, and man-aged to keep the poor lad from getting a single private interview with Nettie, thereby giving Cottend a close field theroby giving Cottrell a clear field, which was evidently satisfactory to the latter, although he did not seem to make much progress. One evening Shorty came to my room in a state of mind. He had seen Sam Parker that day and the latter had told him, as gently as possible, some galling truths about his age and his penniless condition, concluding with the cheerful information that he "reckoned that Net hed bout d'eided to take up with Cottrell, anyheow.'

Of course Shorty was despondent, but he was none the less determined. "Faber. I'm going to see her tomorrow afternoon and—and ask her." The time and hour favored Shorty; but I hardly think Nettie knew her own mind. The boy who came riding slowly home through the shadows next eve-was a very much downcast boy, indeed. He told me all about it, later; how Nettie had wavered and finally told him that she could give no answer. She cared a great deal for him, she said, but she was not sure she cared enough for him. Besides, her father objected to him, and she could never cross her | sale by druggists.

A Close Call.

A Close Call. Mr. J. P. Blaize, an extensive real estate dealer in this city, narrowly escaped one of the severest attacks of pneumonia while in the northern part of the state during the re-cent olizzard. Mr. Blaize had occasion to drive several miles during the storm and was so thoroughly chilled that he was unable to get warm, and inside of an hour after his re-turn he was threatened with a suvere case of pneumonia, or long fover. Mr. Blaize sent to the nearest drug store and got a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy, of which he had often neard, and took a number of large doses. He says the effect was wonderful and that in a short time he was oreathing quite easily. He kept on taking the medicine and the next day was able to come to Des Moines. Mr. Blaize regards his cure as sim-ply wonderful, and says he will never travel again without a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy.
