Urgent Necessity for Checking Outlawry in Wyoming.

AN APPEAL FOR PROMPT ARBITRATION

Serious Times in the Panhandle of Idaho - Tin Development in the Black Hills - Contentions on the Coast - News of the Northwest.

The law-abiding people of Wyoming are beginning to realize that a continuance of the present strife endangers life and property and seriously damages the reputation of the state.

Order and obedience to the law is as essential to the reputation of the state as to the individual. Disorder and lawlessness in a young state seeking capital and settlers will undoubtedly check the influx of both.

Putting aside the causes leading up to the present deplorable state of affairs, the people of Wyoming and the authorities ought to know that a condition approaching anarchy cannot long exist without doing injury to the material welfare of the state that will require years of labor to overcome.

The press is aroused to a sense of the increasing dangers of the situation, and is making a vigorous effort to bring about a compromise.

The Cheyenne Leader calmly reviews the situation and says: "The citizens of Wyoming may well pause at the prospect of a compromise, and the cost. There is even yet time for a peaceful and legal settlement of existing difficulties."

The situation requires tact, moderation and fairness on both sides. The good name of the state is already seriously involved, but it is not utterly disgraced.

A serious state of affairs prevails in the Cover of Alene region between the miners and mine owners. Early in the year the association of mine owners decided to shut down, giving as an excuse that the advanced freight rates made the mines unprofitable.

Within six weeks they decided to resume on the condition that the association would reduce the miners' wages from $3.50 to $3 per day.

The miners refused to accept the reduced rate and a strike was declared. It was impossible to secure workmen in the northwest, but efforts have been made to import a number from eastern states.
