THERE WAS A TEMPORARY RALLY LATER

It Was Claimed That the Indian Shipments for the Week Would Again Show a Light Movement-Stocks and Bonds.

CRICAGO, Ill., Oct. 15.-Pelted with rain and heavy receipts, wheat fell down about '40 Corn was firm for near-by months. and weak for May delivery, leaving off the higher for November and 14c lower for May. The provisions deal seems resting, but pork and ribs on south trading were placed on a tomewhat higher plane of prices. Rain during the night through the winter wheat region was accepted as marking the termination of the drouth and as the precursors of more to come. The main influence was large local receipts and the heavy rain which started free seiling. Later there was good covering by shorts on the decline, and the offerings being moderate with some cash wheat worked here and Pardridge's brokers being buyers, there was a slight raily, which, however, was only temporary. The market at the opening was from the to be lower and declined from the to be more, recoved slightly, but again settled back, declining be more and closing easy. The export clearances from both coasts we esmaller by about 40,000 bu, than the preceding week. It was claimed that Indian shipments for the week would again slow a light movement and was one of the features which was sustaining by English markets. Pardridge was said to be a buyer of December wheat and a soller for May, which was probably true of other shorts as well.

George A. Severns was a buyer of December and ribs on sount trading were placed on a Shorts as well.

George A. Severns was a buyer of December wheat on a considerable scale when the market got down arous 172'ge for December. It's information from the northwest is that the farmers' receipts last we k had fallen about 25 per cent and a further falling off next week

Information from the northwest is that the farmers receipts last we k had tailen about 25 per cent and a further falling off next week to as heavy an extent was expected.

There was quite a flurry in the corn trade. It was caused chiefly by a searce among the shorts in November. The theory has been that new corn will move forward in November to fill the consumptive demand in the east and leave the stocks of old corn heavy on speculators. With the wet weather spreading over most of the courtry the prospects for the new corn getting dry enough to handle early-were less flavorable. At the same time the rains checked the shipments somewhat and receipts were Mac ears this morning. The withdrawais were again heavy at 24,000 bm. There was also rumor of a prospective soucces in November contracts. All this started the shorts to buging and the November price was jumed up like in a burry. Later the cars for Monday were estimated at 853 and the market quekly flattened out.

In outs the last day of the week trought the lowest prices and the market was recatively lower than other leading cereals. At the opening firmness was present, as the receipts were less than expected. But some lines of outs, which had been previously bought for investment, were offered at the outside prices, and there was not enough demand to take them. Speculative offer as soon increased, especially when it was announced that 470 cars are expected for Monday. The market sold off ic from top prices, closing weak at a decline of 5c for the day.

Interest in provisions was restricted to packers and scalingers. January pork was easily advanced 175c over last night's prices, but on an attempt to realize, all but's of the gain was lost. November ribs were advanced 125c. Lard remained nearly stationary.

There were few boats on the market. Rates

Estimated receipts for Monday: Wheat, 48) cars; corn. 800 cars; oats, 470 cars; boats, 26,000 head. Should the inspectors work on six of the leading roads on Sunday, which they probably will, the receipts of corn will be about 1,50 cars.

Compared with last year there has been an increase so far this mouth compared with the first half of October, 1891, of 14:00 cattle and 16:00 logs and a decrease of about 1,740 In general there have been no radical changes in the cattle market the past week. With the supply of good to choice beef steers considerably short of the demand, prices have ruled strong on these grades

With the supply of good to choice beef steers coosiderably short of the demand, prices have raided strong on these grades, and the top prices of the year have been paid for good cattle. On the other hand the offerings of common and inferior cattle have been excessive and while prices have not quotably declined the tr de has been duit and unsatisfactory. This has been particularly true of the "netwix and between" cattle—not good enough for beef and too good for feeders. In butchers' stock and canners the range of prices has been much the same as a week ago with the feeling decidedry weak on all i ut the best fieshy stock.

The feeder trade continues lively enough and prices have been well maintained on anything with the proper weight, flesh and quality. The yards have been filled to overflowing with underweight, trashy stuff, which in the present condition of pasturare is well night unsalable even at extremely low prices. The week closed with a very moderate supply, the quality being about up to the average—that is fair to poor on all but about half a dozen loads. On good stock the trade was brisk and prices ruled strong. Some very good cornfed steers, weighing 1,317 lbs., sold for $4.83, and a four-load bunch of choice Montana grass cattle that averaged 1.427 lbs. brought $1.49, the highest price paid for grass cattle here in a month. On the medium and common stuff the business lacked snap and life, but prices in general were not quotably channed and a fair clearance was finally effected.

But her stuff and canners brought steady prices all around. The range was from $1.10 to $2.35, the bulk at from $1.60 to $2.15. Haus,

JIMMY THE GUIDE.

Walter B. Cooke in California Magazine. I go slumming occasionally, at least once a year, and sometimes twice, at times with some chosen friend, but preferably alone. It is such a change from the beaten path of everyday life; so different from the pleasant side of the world that one observes at home, in fushionable salons, or at balls and cotillons. Therein lies its charm, transitory though it be. One night recently, after a respite of perhaps a year, I donned an old suit of clothes and other accessories to match it, put a number of halves, quarters and dimes in my pockets for ready change, and proceeded carelessly toward BarbaryCoast, the fountain head of vice and the haunt of criminals, and the most debased of our male and female population. The Colorado, El Dorado, Arizona and Scandinavian halls were all inspected, presenting to my eyes no change in a year. The same faces were seen before and behind the bars, the same waiter girls "chased the duck" with agile feet, and their eyes were ever on the alert for a "sleeper," or an error in change, while the same motley crew of sailors, soldiers and others were being fleeced a usual. It was interesting, however, to a certain degree, especially in the Scandinavian, where two female jerkers" were severely pummeling a riendless Italian, because he, in his mild, drunken stuper, objected to paying twice for the same drinks.

I left there soon and crossed over to the Marble hall, a large underground dive, well lighted, and crowded patrons. Waiter girls ran to and fro with drinks, and as the astnmatic orchestra played "Mary Green," each sought a partner and danced a species of waltz, that would create a sensation if introduced at the meetings of the Friday Night club. I ordered a pony of beer and sat quietly watching and studying the people there, endeavoring in my mind to form some idea of their vocation from their appearance. One man, quite near to me, attracted my at tention particularly as there was something reminiscent about his face and figure. The more I studied him the more my brain sought some avenue through which I could recognize him. until at length my thoughts traveled back through the vista of time twelve years, and following narrative formed my mental photograph: In the early spring of 1880 a friend and myself resolved to make a trip to Yo-semite vailey. Every one tried to dis-suade us, but he insisted upon going, as he was from the east, and was obliged to return to his home soon. He was thoroughly determined to see the valley then or never; (so we started. Merced was reached by rail and Mariposa furnished us shelter the second night, after a hard stage ride of twelve hours over rough roads. The following morning we se cured saddle horses at Mariposa, and a guide in the form of diminutive colored boy, or rather a man, as he was twenty-two years of age. His name was Mose, at at least that was all he claimed ownership to. He was almost a prototype the once famous "Little who was so well known on the min-strel stage years ago, and his comical appearance and make-up put us in good humor that cold, crisp morning. We were assured that he knew every foot of the mountain country, was honest and reliable. The express agent gave us this assurance. and coupled it with the information that a lady and gentleman had preceded us one day on the road to the valley. We struck out over the hills and mountains and reached Hite's Cove about 4 o'clock in the afternoon feeling quite tired. To our surprise the lady and gentlemen mentioned by the express agent were at the hotel and their detention was explained by the innkeeper who said that the lady was too tired to travel; so with the guide they had taken a day's rest. The guide was a strange contrast to our little Mose. He was over six feet in height, somewhat gaunt as to frame. though evidently powerful, and his long, matted, reddish hued beard rested far down on his breast. His eyes were the peculiar feature of his physiognomy. They were sunken deep in the sockets and tufted almost all around by his beard and his heavy eyebrows that connected over the bridge

At dinner we were introduced to the two travelers, Air. and Mrs. Carew, of Kansas City, they styled themselves, and they seemed to be quite pleasant peome. Although in middle life, and noparently married many years, they emed, at times, almost as ish" as a newly wedded couple. We all agreed to start together the valley in the morning, and they gave every evidence of delight in having our company. They retired early, but I and my traveling companion, Jack Gilman, an old college chum, went into the barroom and played billiards. Soon the room came filled with miners, for Hite's Cove was a great mining camp then, and may be now, for all I know, and its gold sustained a high assay. These miners were not the class of men that one would meet at his club, and although they partially resented our intrusion they gave but little out-ward evidence of it. Still we knew enough to stop playing billiards in a hurry, and took positions at the end of the long bar, adjacent to the doorway, leading to the hall. A few minutes later Carew's guide entered, and as he did so he was greeted with a shout and a chorus of biasphemous remarks from rough miners, who instantly seized him, bore him to his knees on the floor and then covering him with their revolvers made him He did pray and he prayed well and long. Then these demons made him sing hymns, and as he sang they formed a circle around and danced like evil spirits in high carnival. Each hymn or song was followed by a drink, and they came thick and fast. This was all very exciting and interesting to us "ten-derfeet," as we had been dubbed, until some one threw a chair at the mirror behind the bar. Then thirty revolvers blazed out an anthem toward the ceiling and we disappeared through the doorway in great haste. The fusilade continued, and we sought fresh air at the rear of the house. At last the shooting ceased, and climbing carefully to a back window we saw that the barroom was a wreck. Every mirror, bottle, glass and chair was broken and the miners were on the floor in a state of exhaustion, with the guide still kneeling near the stove. We had no desire to return to the scene of carnage, so we sought our rooms and were soon asleep. We arose at 6 o'clock, and before breakfast had an explanation of the previous night's scene from the barkeeper.

"You see," said he, "it was all on account of Jimmy the guide. He's one of them religious cranks called Seven Day Adventurists, and all the boys know it; so when he comes up here they just have some fun with him. They never hurt him nor anyone else and always pays well for the damage done to the bar. I always tries to keep Jimmy away, but sometimes he can't help

We took the explanation, and mutually agreed that we did not admire the California miner's idea of fun. Jimmy turned up early, looking no worse than ever. Mose was on hand with his widely expansive, grinning countenance and Mr. and Mrs. Carew were ready for the day's trip. Break-fast was finished quickly and our party of six were soon in the saddle. journey commenced by making an ascent of the almost perpendicular trail up the mountain side at the rear of the hotel, and it was a task for both horses and riders. Jimmy, the guide, fed the way, with our little black man bringing up the rear. They exchanged very remarks, and Jimmy always had pre-cedence in everything. At last we reached the summit and soon afterwards had a view of mountain scenery that has hardly a counterpart in America. Fierce-looking, rugged crags arose apparently to the sky from the pretty valley beneath us, and the immense layers of granite were tapestried in fanciful designs with fleecy masses of snow, cold, glistening relics of the winter that the sun was fast melting.

The scenery was that of Switzerland, and differed from that of the Yosemite valley beyond it by being thoroughly picturesque without any tinge of grandeur or sublimity. Down we went over the mountain trail, our horses carefully feeling their way, until we reached the precipitous side of the mighty chasm through which the Merced river madly flows over the immense fallen boulders of granite, seething and foaming in its wild course. There the trail ended and across the chasm, eighty feet wide at that point, was a rudely constructed suspension bridge, wrought of bows of trees woven together into a comparatively strong framework. It looked like tempting providence to cross it, but both of our guides said we must, as there was no other way to reach the other side and the Yosemite vailey, some fourteen miles away.

Jimmy told Mose to cross first alone, foot, to test the strength of the bridge. He did so and returned in safety. Then after muffling the feet of our horses in gunny sacks, to prevent them from slipping on the smooth surface of the bridge, Mose led his horse over the swaying structure, then Jack's, and afterwards mine. He was about to take the other horses over. when Jimmy said to him, mind them, I'll fix them myself. Then turning to Jack and myself he said. "Now you two can go over, one at a time, and we will cross afterwards.

I will pledge my word that all the hearded gold of the Indies could not tempt me to cross that bridge again. Imagine that frail structure of boughs swinging to and fro with the wind that swept through the canon, with only one narrow rail at either side as a support for the hands, while below me. a hundred feet, was the river, dashing along over the rocks, every one of which seemed to me to be a death's head star ing me in the face. However, Mose, Jack and myself treached the other side all right, and as we mounted our horses we noticed that Mr. and Mrs. Carew and Jimmy were having quite a serious conversation, judging from the expressions of their faces. Finally Mr. and Mrs. Carew stepped on the bridge together. She was ahead and he supported her as best he could. When they were midway was going. and the bridge was carried from its moorings on the other side of the chasm and fell into the abyss, carrying the two unfortunates with it. Piercing shricks rent the air for a moment and then were silenced by the ceaseless roar of the river as it thundered along. We were all spellbound by the awful catastrophe, but soon recovered, and, dis-mounting, looked over the brink of the precipice for the bodies. There they were, silent in death, being carried along by the flood, farther, farther away from us until soon they were beyond our vision. What could we go? It was impossible to return the way we came, as the other end of the bridge was dang ling below us on the rocks, our end still being held by the ropes. Jimmy was shouting and making frantic signals to us, but we could not understand him or hear him, as the rushing waters drowned his voice. So we finally turned to our guide for information. As we looked inquiringly at him he said to me:

"Boss, I always knowed dat bridge

warn't safe nohow, "But that isn't the thing," I said.

'Can't do nuffin' now, Boss, 'cept go to de valley.' he answered. This we did over an Indian trail for miles, leaving Jimmy to make his way back to Mariposa as best he could After the experience we had, our trip was not a pleasant one, especially as most of it was on a narrow trail that was but a shelf in midair, with a thousand feet of granite towering precipitously above us and a thousand feet more of the same below, with the Merced at the bottom. Upon arriving in the Yesemite valley we put up at Liedig's hotel and stayed there two days. It was impossible to make the ascent of any of the trails then, owing to the ice and snow that covered them. We returned to Mariposa by way of Wawona, suffering much in a snowstorm that struck us at Inspiration Point. At Mariposa, we told our story to the authorities. The sheriff had heard of it from Jimmy. the guide, who brought the horses back safely and then suddenly disappeared. We returned to San Francisco by stage and rail, and soon atterwards Jack went east. I have never seen him since nor did I ever hear the finale of the Carew episode. This story, in brief, was what flashed through my mind as I sat in that dive and gazed at the stranger at the next table. Suddenly he turned in his chair, and, getting a full view of his face, I saw at once that he was Jimmy, the guide. I immediately took a seat at his table and, tapping him on the arm said to him:

"Hello, Jimmy, have you been up at Mariposa or Hite's Cove lately?" He turned quickly and said "Stranger, I reckon you've made a mistake.

"Oh, no I haven't," I auswered. 'You are Jimmy, the guide, who was with Mr. and Mrs. Carew in April, 1880, who went from Mariposa to Hite's Cove, and then were killed the following day by the falling of the suspension bridge over the Merced river. .I know you. "Oh, yes, stranger, I recken I reckerlect you now. Yes, yes." Then he mused for a moment and said:

'I never expected to see you again." "No, nor did I expect to see you. Here waiter, two beers. Oh, you'll take whisky. Well, make it a beer and a whisky straight." This interruption for refreshments was followed by a few remarks about my trip to the Yosemite valley; then we had our drinks, and I asked him how it happened that the bridge broke down. He turned to me and his eyes twinkled devilishly as he said:

"That woman used to be my wife and she ran away with that man ten years met them in Mariposy They didn't know me, stranger, on account of my beard, and I wasn't as pretty then as I used to be. them, though, and that's how that bridge broke down. Look here stranger," he then said, quickly, "I reckon I'm talking too much and I'm going out. Perhaps it'll be best for your health if you sit just where you are for half an hour and keep your mouth shut. If you do move, there'll be another bridge broken somewhere," He vanished from sight and I held that chair down for an hour. Then went home.
