GRAND ARMY DEPARTMENT

A Visit to the Old California Heme of Fighting Jos Hooken

RELICS OF THE FAMOUS GENERAL

Interesting Reminiscences of Grant's Preparations for the Capture of Vicksburg-A Prophecy-Queer Sames on the Pension Roll.

A correspondent who recently visited the old California home of "Fighting Joe" Hooker unearthed many interesting relies of the famous general. After California was wrested from Mexico. Lieutenant Hooker resigned his commission in the army and settled in California in 1850. In the fall of that year he purchased a farm of 640 acres in Sonoma valley at the foot of Napa mountain, and upon a high knoll, sheltered by ancient live-oaks, he built a modest dwelling which for several years was his home. Up and down the valley and to the west the fields are broad and level, and when, in 1858, Hooker dispored of the property it bore several hundred acres of splendid vineyards of his own planting. A portion of this vineyard is in existence today. In 1858 Hooker sold the ranch to Mr. George C. Watriss, and the house that was once the residence of the hero of Lookout Mountain is now used for the accommodation of farm hands. It is a small building, containing four small rooms. "I was allowed one day to climb up to the loft in the old Hooker house," says the correspondent, "where I was told I would find a lot of 'rubbish' that was at one time the property of the general. In overnauling the piles of broken furniture and wornout farming implements that I found stowed away under the eaves I came across a leather trunk battered and gnawed by mice. On the front of the trunk was fastened a brass plate hearing, in fine script, the name 'Joseph Hooker.' The trunk was half full of musty documents, and some of them have the signature of Alexander Forbes, under date of 1845. There were also several letters of a private charac ter addressed to Lieutenaut Joseph Hooker. There was also a pamphlet containing a list of graduates from the United States Military academy at West Point from 1801 to 1841 inclusive. This pamphlet, published in 1841, bore the signature of Joseph Hooker and Irvin McDowell, first lieutenant, First artillery, adjutant Military academy.

"In one corner of the loft I found an old army saddle with Hooker's name traced in the brass trimmings of the pommel. Rats had gnawed at the surcingle and stirrup straps. Near the saddle was a broken camp chair and a lantern of primitive pattern. The chair had been fastened together with wire, and the initials 'J. H.' were cut into the back. The lantern was a cumbersome affair, with a mica chimney. Inside was the remnant of a candie.

'A musket and a horsepistol that were once the property of Hooker had been more carefully laid away. They were hanging or a rack suspended from the They were rusteaten and festooned with spiders' web. A scrap of diary found among Hooker's private papers in the leather trunk tells the history of the musket, which is not uninteresting. It was presented to Lieutenant Hooker by Colonel J. W. McKenzie, who got possession of it in the following manner: At the storming of the gates of San Cosme, Mexico, September 13, 1847, McKenzie's only piece of artillery, a twelve-pound howitzer, was moved forward to a small earth work within 200 yards of the fortifications. "Nea ly all of McKenzie's men had been killed or were disabled, and having but five rounds of grapeshot left he sent two men-all that were able to walk-to the rear for ammunition. He had fired his last round of powder when an infantry soldier came from his place of shelter under the arches of the grand aqueduct to assist him, and while crossing the road to where McKenzie lay he was killed. McKenzie ran to the fallen man, secured his musket and ammunition belt and returned to shelter, receiving but a slight wound in his left hand. With the ammunition that he secured McKenzie kept up the fight until help came to him from the rear.

'Dust-covered and broken I found an ald style mahogany dressing case and a card table that had belonged to Hooker. The card table was an elaborate piece of furniture. It was inlaid with pearl, and was evidently imported, for the designs and cleverness of the workmanship evidenced the deft fingers of Japanese "In early days Lieutenant Hooker was a prominent figure in the politics of So-noma county. In 1853 the democrats headed their ticket with his name as a nominee for the assembly. The Settlers' convention (there was no republican party in Sonoma county in those days) nominated in opposition to Hocker a pioneer named James Bennett. The between Hooker and Bennett hinged directly on the question of removing the county seat from the town of Sonoma to Santa Rosa. The fight was a hard one and resulted in a tie vote. A second election was held, and Hooker was defeated by eight votes. The records of Sonoma county show that the same year Joseph Hooker was appointed road overseer in Sonoma township.

"Hooker's Falls are located at the head of a deep canyon in the Napa mountains. A stream of water tumbles down the rugged side of a ravine into a broad, deep pool, surrounded by tall redwood The trail that leads from the valley to Hooker's Falls is a very dangerous one to follow. It winds along the side of the canyon, and in many places it is so narrow that two persons cannot

The guide tells a rather exciting story of how one day Hooker, who was hunting in the canyon, met at one of these points in the trail a bear, and after vain attempts to kill the brute with a ball his rifle he closed with it and fought the animal desperately with a hunting knife. During the fight man and bear rolled down the side of the canyon. Hooker, wounded and bleeding, ledged in the limbs of a redwood tree, and was taken down a few hours later by a searching party that had come out for him. The bear was found at the bottom of the ravine dead. "Lieutenant Hooker was but one of a coterie of young army officers who were quartered in Sonoma valley in 1850, and across Sonoma creek from the Hooker ranch stands 'The Rendezvous,' where the young army officers were in the habit of meeting weekly to pass an evening at cards, chess and other social pastimes, which were sweetened by the barquet of the native wines that had been casked for years in the musty cellays of Pedro Curillo, a wrinkled Spaniah miser, who threw the doors of his raner house open to visitors only when they were willing to pay handsomely tor their entertainment. "About the building, which is still habitable, broad-limbed oak trees cast their shadows, and a tall flagstaff, erected by Pedro Curllio at the request of his military patrons, stands in the yard.

From this staff, when there were important questions to be discussed or an en-tertainment to be given, the American flag was suspended, and those of the select coterie of habitues of 'The Ren-dezvous' who saw it floating in the breeze made haste to obey its call.

"From the county road that now runs through the back yard of 'The Rendezyous, a winning trail ascends the side of Sonoma mountain, and crossing its summit drops into a deep, shadowy can-yon, that is filled with the magnified roar of Sonoma Falls, a ribbon of foaming water that leaps down a rocky steep from a height of more than 200 feet to the bettom of the gulch."

Story of an Iowa Veteran.

Very few of the hundreds of persons who know Jith Coe of Ottumwa, Ia., for one of the best fellows who ever walked on shoe leather suspect that this is his second time on earth. But it is, and there is a might pretty little story connected with his taking off and subsequent resurrection.

Along back in the early '60's Jim was younger than he is, but no better natured, and instead of that big bunch of whiskers that hides the better part of his handsome face, he was carrying a musket in company G of the 159th New York volunteers, doing all that a private soldier could to put down the rebelifon. He appeared on the company roster as "Private James H. Coe, Athens, N. Y." In leaving home his good old father, Rev. Jonathan Coe, gave to his son a Book of Common Prayer and a copy of the new testament, which Jim, like the good fellow he is, carried in his breast pocket at all times. It so happened that on the 19th day of September, 1864, while the battle of Winchester, Va., was at its height, the regiment to which young Coe belonged found itself directly in front of a confederate battery of six guns, which was being served with an enthusiasm worthy of a better object. This battery was charged by the New Yorkers.

Not far from Douglasville, Ga., on a fine plantation, lives John D. Pope, a scarred confederate veteran. On that fateful September day in '64 Pope was private in Company G, Forty-fourth Georgia volunteers, Confederate States of America, which regiment was sup-porting the battery that was causing the New Yorkers so much uneasiness. When the Yankees made their charge the Johanies met them with such a warm reception that the former soon concluded that they hadn't lost any cannons, and that they'd better get out. In the getting out a great many brave boys from New York were left on the field. Among them was Jim Coe, shot through and dead as a door nail. Along came the Georgians in hot pursuit. John D. Pope had fired so rapidly that his gun was too hot to handle with comfort, when he saw Coe lying on the ground with a good gun and a box of cartridges peside him. Pope stooped down, got the gun and was picking up the cartridges, when a bullet struck him and he fell on Coe, dead himself.

After a long time, when the battle was over, Pope came back to life sufficiently to look around a little; and found himself lying on top of the Yankee whose gun and ammunition he had intended taking. On the ground had fallen a prayerbook and testament. These Pope put in his pocket, and later he was removed from the field. times after that Pope thought of the poor Yankee boy across whose corpse he lay on the field of Winchester, and often wondered if his parents had learned of his end. Finally, in 1872, Pope wrote Jonathan Coe, giving account of the circumstance, and offering to return the prayer-But the good old man died in 1866. His wife got the letter and gave it to Jim to answer. Jim in the meantime had been resurrected by one of those peculiar processes that saved many a good fellow's life after he had been already killed. He wrote to Mr. Pope, but got no reply. There the matter rested twenty years. One day last July Coe, who is now master mechanic on the Milwaukee at

Ottumwa, got to thinking over the matter and finally concluded he would write again to his Georgia enemy, hoping that maybe he was still alive and would give some satisfaction for his conduct at Winchester. This time the let ter reached its destination all right and in due time there came a reply. An interchange of missives followed and on October 15 Coc set sail for Douglasville whither his photograph had preceded him. About 5 o'clock a couple of evenings later he saw a great throng of men drawn up on a depot platform at a little station 'way down in Dixie. "Is this Mr. Coe?" was the query as he stepped from the train. "It is," he answered, and the next instant he was clasped in a pair of ex-confederate arms, and those great, strong men, who had once been shot down and left for dead in the heat of battle, clung to each other and cried like school girls, while 200 ex-rebels shouted themselves hoarse for the Yank who had died and was risen. After the first greetings were ex-changed men, women and children gathered around to shake Mr. Coe's hand. He held an impromptu levee on the depot platform, and then went with Mr. Pope to his home in the country. There for a week Private Coe enjoyed treatment that would have made General Weaver jump for joy if he had only received a little bit of it. Ex-members of Early's army came thirty miles to shake Cee's hand, and not a thing was left undone to convince him that as pleasant a thing as a man can do is to die and come to life again along with a Georgia soldier.

Jim Coe is again on duty in his office at the roundhouse, but among his treasures he has laid a prayerbook and testament which he carried when he marched away from home in 1862. And in his heart he has a warmer corner than ever before for the Johnnies, while his comrades of Clautmore post agree with him that many a good man wore the gray in those days.

A Prophecy Fulfilled.

Writing of "Some Incidents of the War, " in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Joseph B. McCullagh says: "The transfer of the Army of the Tennessee from Oxford to Milliken's Bend and Young's Point, in the vicinity of Vicksburg, was followed, it will be remembered, by a period of inactivity of three months' duration, which greatly discouraged the north, demoralized the army itself and engendered a strong desire for Grant's removal, which manifested itself in the press and extended to the politicians. Grant is not unmindful of these facts in his Memoirs. He says: 'Because I would not divulge my ultimate plans to visitors they pronounced me idle, incompetent and unfit to command men in an emergency, and clamored for my removal. they even suggested who his successor should be, 'and named McClernand, f'remont, Hunter and McClellan in this connection.' Strange to say, the general omits from the list the man most prominently urged as his successor. This was General Rosecrans, who had recently risen to fame and distinction on the battle of Stone river. All this recalls to recollection a little conversation which I overheard about the perfed of Grant's greatest eclipse—that period which was supposed to immediately precede his total obscuration. One night early in April, 1863, I was scated on a chair just outside the forward part of the main cabin of the steamboat Magnolla, the ladies' cabin of which, cut off by folding doors from the rest of the vessel, was occupied by General Grant as the headquarters of himself and staff. She was tied to the shore at Milliken's Bend, just above Vicksburg. I was one of the boarders which the steward was allowed to take care of, for a considera-tion, in the forward part of the boat. The night in question was very dark, so that I could only hear, and could neither see nor be seen. Suddenly three menone of whom I recognized as Congress-man Elihu B. Washburne of Illinois, the other two being then and to this day unknown to me-came out of the cabin and stood near me, asking a serv ant of the boat when a certain vessel would start for Memphis. 'Well, he will take Vicksburg said one of them. 'Yes, and he will be the next president of the United States,' said another, whose voice I thought to be that of Mr. Washburne. I afterwards learned that the trio had spent the whole afternoon and evening with General Grant In close consultation about the Vicksburg probabilities; and that they had done so in pursuance of a request from President Lincoln. They had come down the river the day before, and were ready to start back when I saw them, Mr. Lincoln had evidently become nervous about the situa-tion down the Mississippi, and had sent these men to confer with Grant, find out what the chances were and report to him. Whether Grant divulged to them the remarkable plans which he afterwards carried into such successful execution, I, of course, do not know, but he seems to have satisfied them on the subject of their inquiry, and to have enthused them into a leap from military success to the presidency. 'He will take Vicksburg, Yes, and he will be next President of the United States,' This was early in 1863. Three months later he took Vicksburg, and six years later he was president of the United States, having in the meantime-at Baltimore in 1864—received the vote of the republican detegation from Missouri as the nominge for that high office."
