BUTCHER STOLE HIS BRIDE

Waterloo Society Torn up Over an Elopement in High Life.

PRETTY PEARL PARK FOOLED HER PAPA

Daughter of the Village Merchant Prince Elopement and Marries the Knight of the Saw and Cleaver in Spite of Papa's Strong Opposition.

The fashionable society of the little town of Waterloo is all torn up, and the cause of the tear is an elopement in high life.

The merchant prince of the town is F. Park, and he has a daughter, Pearl, a bright-eyed lass of seventeen summers, who is fair to look upon. For some time she has been the belle of the town, and any and all of the lads were ready and willing to fall down and worship at her shrine, but they were not all permitted to enjoy this privilege, for there was a favored suitor, one J. L. Denton, the town butcher, who was possessed of some wealth and a fairly good looking face. Whether cutting steaks or chops, Denton's thoughts always went out to Pearl, the merchant's daughter. As he pressed his suit, the magnate of the Park household looked on with any amount of displeasure, openly declaring that a common town butcher was not worthy the hand of his daughter, who, as he put it, was better suited to preside over the parlors of a prince. Pearl listened to all of the pretty talk, but she had no idea of joining hands with a prince, or anything of the kind, and having a mind of her own she conveyed the information to that father of hers that a butcher was good enough for her, and that she preferred love in a cottage to waiting for a rich man, with a possible chance of dying an old maid.

This pretty and playful remark caused the father to boil over with anger and he at once proceeded to inform Mr. Denton that he must not darken the door of the Park mansion again.

Of course this caused a scene, and tears flowed freely, but Papa Park's heart was hardened and instead of relenting he simply told Miss Pearl that if she attempted to meet young Denton she would be locked in her room and there kept until she was ready to cry "hold, enough." It was simply a case where true love took considerable pleasure in laughing at the locksmith. Pearl made all kinds of promises, but she did not intend to keep them for a minute, as she fully realized that a bad promise was better broken than kept. Last Sunday, unbeknownst to the members of her family, she met Denton down on the banks of the raging Elkhorn, where, there and then, a job was put up on her father. The job was in the same line of many a one that has been waged against obstreperous and unyielding parents. It was simple, and it was to elope with the coming of the night. All the little preliminaries were arranged, after which the two young people went back to the town, taking different routes, and looking as innocent as two of the last spring lambs. Pearl was as happy as a lark and went about the household duties, singing some little ditty that pleased her father as much as any, and after the dinner was over and the family had gathered in the great room, Papa Park took occasion to remark that it was many a day since he had seen Pearl feel so blithe and gay, and he hoped that she had concluded to give up that butcher. When Pearl heard this she refrained from saying a word, notwithstanding the fact that she was almost dying to tell the old man of the surprise party that was in store. As night drew on apace, Pearl sought the seclusion of her chamber, and there, under the light of the lamp, she tied up a bundle of her best clothes and dropped them from the window.

Went to Gretna, Sure. During all of this time Mr. Denton was not idle, for he was hunting a man who for a consideration was willing to stay in the butcher shop for a few days and manipulate the saw and cleaver. Having found that man he proceeded to the livery stable, where he hired the fleetest team and a driver was engaged to take two persons to Gretna, in Sarpy county. The driver was cautioned to keep a close mouth and be at the back gate of the fence that surrounded the Park residence at an hour not later than 8 o'clock. A coin was slipped into the hand of the livery stable man and away Mr. Denton went to array himself in his best suit of clothes.

When the hour of 8 was tolled off by the town clock the team, driver, Mr. Denton and a bundle of clothes backed up to that back gate. A minute later one of the windows of the Park residence went up and a pretty girl appeared. With a spring she leaped into her lover's arms and was hurried to the waiting carriage. The whip was plied to the horses and away the party went toward the Sarpy county line. The couple told the driver to make for Gretna, and when that town was reached Denton and the girl bowed a train for Papillon, reaching there Monday morning, where the knot was tied as tight as the county judge could draw it.

When the Monday morning sun arose at Waterloo, the rage in the Park residence was something frightful to behold. The head of the household declared that he would see something rash and at once went to the station, from whence he sent telegrams in every direction, instructing the officials of the towns along the line to stop the wedding and arrest the parties who wanted to be made one. The telegrams were too late, for even when they were sent, Mr. Park's daughter was Mrs. Denton, instead of Miss Pearl Park.

Friends of the parties are now laboring to bring about a reconciliation.
