WERE COOL AS CUCUMBERS. How Grant and Thomas Bore Themselves During the Missionary Ridge Affair.

NO OUTWARD SIGN OF AGITATION SEEN. Calmly Chewing His Cigar the Silent Man Watched the Progress of the Struggle.

A writer in the Washington Post sketches the bearing of Grant and Thomas during the memorable battle of Missionary Ridge.

Early in the morning of the eventful day, Grant and Thomas, with their respective staff officers, rode to the summit of Missionary Ridge.

It need not be said that neither Grant nor Thomas had had much rest the preceding night; indeed both were worn and fatigued.

The firing from the batteries was at times heavy on both sides, and the "Knot" did not escape the attention of the enemy.

Such were the circumstances under which the generalissimo of the Union army was captured.

General Sherman's capture of the "Knot" was a great triumph for the Union army.

rather than of safe defense. He was the last of the old school commanders to fight an old style battle.

Captain H. O. Wood of the Seventy-sixth United States Infantry, at Nashville, Tenn., received an interesting letter from Phil Alexander.

As if operated by fixed machinery, the troops which had been lying in wait on the broken plain, partly hidden by the growth of small trees.

Nothing escaped the eyes of Grant and Thomas, who stood near together, speaking only occasionally.

The height was gained, the crest was taken, On the plains beyond the enemy was fleeing.

What of Grant's manner now? What of Thomas? That both generals were relieved as the action happens to have been.

That night, long past midnight, Grant might have been seen alone in the quarters at Chattanooga.

It is an old story, but it is a good one. Captain Johnson of the Globe-Democrat has written it up.
