A TRUE LOVE.

Anna Shields.

Daisy Metcalf and I made our appearance in this world of care upon the same day, and our mammas being old friends, we became from mere childhood fast friends and companions.

In the eighteen years during which we had grown from infancy to womanhood, Paul Metcalf, Daisy's father, had made one of those mammoth fortunes that result from successful modern speculation.

My dear father, on the contrary, had been treading the path that leads downward in the race for fortune, and we were poor folks compared to the Metcalfs.

Daisy, being an only child and a little beauty, entered society as a belle and heiress; her costumes imported from Paris, her jewels of the most costly description, her carriages, horses, surroundings of ever kind those that only wealth can procure.

When I say that we were poor folks I do not mean that we were reduced to suffering poverty, but we lived in a very quiet way; and while I economized in the housekeeping department, Fred, my only brother, worked at clerking in a wholesale drug store and helped my overworked father in the family expenses.

We were invited out and had our share of gayety, but my costumes were the work of my fingers, the same material often serving for two or three dresses, and my jewel box was my inheritance from my mother and but a stock of pretty trinkets.

I don't know when I first suspected that Fred was in love with Daisy. We three had been so much together. Fred being only three years older than Daisy and myself, that it was a matter of course for both of us to depend upon Fred as an escort and to fulfill the duties of a brother to Daisy as well as to his own sister.

I think it was the winter when we both "came out" at a party given by Mrs. Metcalf, to introduce me as well as Daisy to society, that I first noticed a change in Fred.

He began to plead another engagement quite frequently when I was going to Metcalf's or wanted him to act as Daisy's escort as well as mine.

He no longer hurried home when Daisy came to dine and spend a quiet evening at our house. The duets they had learned together lay untouched for weeks upon the music rack, and I no longer saw Fred's name upon Daisy's small programs for four of five dances.

And as he grew graver and some of the gay, boyish light died out of his eyes, Daisy, too, lost some of the old, girlish brightness, and her step no longer danced and sprang as if from mere joyousness.

I might have noticed more if my own heart had not gone out of my own keeping during that winter, and the manly fascinations of Harry Wilmer engrossed my own dreams.

This is not my love story, so it suffices here to say that at Easter I became Mrs. Henry Wilmer and took possession of a handsome house and shared the large income of a wealthy husband.

It had hastened my wedding a little that my father and Fred had had a most favorable offer to go together to San Francisco to open a branch business for the firm who employed Fred. So the old home was broken up, and a week after my wedding father and Fred started for their new home.

On the last evening, Fred took me a little into his confidence, not frankly and fully as he had in many less important matters, but letting me guess much of the love filling his heart, the pride binding him to silence.

By such half confidence, I felt sure that Saul Metcalf's great wealth and his own uncertain prospects kept him from letting Daisy see the love he cherished, almost without hope, for he thought she only felt the sisterly affection of long intimate friendship for him.

"Daisy will think you very unkind not to spare her five minutes," I said.

"You do not understand," he answered, impatiently. "I am not unkind; I am only miserable. There! I don't want any pity. It is all right; but there are some things a fellow cannot stand and not betray himself. To bid her farewell, for years, perhaps, calmly, quietly, as a mere friend, is beyond my strength."

"But why not tell her you love her?"

"Who said I loved her? Don't be so romantic. I am not going to figure in Saul Metcalf's eyes as a fortune hunter. Just tell Daisy I cannot get round, and say goodby for me."

And before I could answer Fred was off.

The next morning Harry and I bade my father and brother goodby for an indefinite time, and, as it broved, my parting from my dear father was a final one.

Two years later he died, and it was six years before Fred returned home and then only for a brief visit to me in the winter.

It was at the very height of the fever for art embroidery, and my parlors were crowded with specimens of work—gifts, many of them; some the result of my own industry, though most of my efforts went to adorn the person of my first born, Harry, and my wee baby girl, Nettie.

I challenged Fred's admiration for all my pretty trifles, until I led him to a most elaborate affair in hand painted satin, plush bands and chenille fringe.

"This," I said, "is the gem of my lot of art work. You would never guess that was only a common wooden milking stool, would you? Just such a stool as our grandmothers used in the country years ago. Did you ever see lovelier painting and such fine embroidery as there is on the plush bands?"

"Who gave it to you?" Fred asked, trying with brotherly good nature to seem interested.

"I bought it."

"I should think you had enough without purchasing any," my brother said, laughing.

"Yes; but this was to help an old friend. I bought it of Daisy Metcalf. You remember Daisy?" I continued, not noticing the sudden pallor in Fred's face. "She does this sort of work for a store in New York, but they do not half pay her, and her old friends order pretty things tyey do not actually want to help her."

"What do you mean?" Fred cried, his voice sharp with pain.

"You knew Saul Metcalf was dead, did you not?"

"No. You must have written that in some of the letters that were lost while I was in Japan."

"It was just about that time," I said. "I surely wrote it to you. Mr. Metcalf's fortune, that was supposed to amount to millions, did not cover his debts when the estate was settled. Everything was sold, even Daisy's jewels and grand piano."

"Why is she not here?" Fred said, walking up and down the long rooms to the infinite peril of my spindle-legged tables and fragile bric-a-brac. "You professed to love her. Why do you not give her a home?"

"Because she won't take it! You need not look at me as if I was a monster, Fred! I tried every way to make Daisy come here. I even offered her a salary to come as nursery governess for Henry and Nettie and made her laugh out as merrily as she did in our girlish days when she had not a care. But she is as proud as—as—some other folks I know, and would not take charity even from me."

"Where is she?"

"She is boarding at 427 L— street."

"And Daisy lives there. Daisy, who never knew a want in her whole petted life!"

"Poor little Daisy!" he said presently. "Think of her wasting her eyesight upon such work as this, while I—"

"Yes," I said, after waiting some time for the conclusion of the sentence—"you?"

"I am not a millionaire, as Saul Metcalf was supposed to be," Fred said, "but I am on the road to wealth, and I am already a rich man. What time is it? Nearly 11! Too late to call anywhere now."

"I should say so," I said.

"Tomorrow Daisy dines here," I said. "She comes to dinner every Tuesday and Harry escorts her home in the evening. He might, however, be persuaded to resign that duty for once tomorrow."

We chatted a few minutes longer and then Fred went to his room, carrying Daisy's milking stool with him.

Whether he sat up all night contemplating that work of art I am unable to say, but I do know that the next afternoon when a pale little Daisy, in deep mourning, came into my sitting room, expecting to find me alone, she had no reason to complain of Fred's coolness.

"The course of true love" ran very smoothly for the next month, the time of Fred's visit to me; and when he returned to San Francisco it was not alone.

Daisy put her pride aside and let me provide her trousseau and the wedding, at my house, called together all her old friends.

There was a very handsome show of wedding presents, but mine was most carefully packed by Fred's own hands and was presented at his request. Harry gave the silver service I had selected as my gift, for Fred begged that I would give them Daisy's milking-stool.

Foretold in a Dream.

New York Sun: Captain Evans of the Neptune line steamship Delano, which broke her propeller during a terrible storm on a voyage from Rotterdam and was assisted to Halifax by the steamer Ohio, says that the coming of the Ohio to his assistance was foretold to him in a dream. The Delano was repaired at Halifax and then proceeded to Baltimore.

The captain says that he thought the steamer would founder soon after the propeller broke in the hurricane on Christmas eve, but after twenty-four hours the winds went down.

Worn out with long watching and loss of rest, the captain says he fell asleep on the night of December 27 and dreamed that a sister ship, the Ohio, hove in sight and took his disabled vessel in tow. He awoke to find the dream not yet realized and all of that day and far into the next night his vessel drifted.

To the first man who should sight a sail a reward was offered and everyone on board the apparently doomed craft was alert.

On the afternoon of December 28 several of the crew sighted a vessell in the distance. "It's the Ohio," was shouted over the floundering ship, and sure enough soon the red marks of her funnel proclaimed the coming craft to be a sister ship, the Ohio.

The captain's dream foretold that the rescuing ship would come about on the starboard side, and she did.

NORTH GALVESTON, Tex., Jan. 21.—In eastern Texas, and only a few miles from North Galveston, one of the greatest timber tracts on this continent exists. It comprises 46,300,000 acres, and this includes every variety of high grade, hard and soft lumber. Furniture and other wood-work industries are rapidly becoming interested in this great field of raw material, and the prospects for new markets, by reason of rapid development, in the southern commercial field.

From Private to President.

A bit of history connected with the life of Emil Frey, who was recently elected vice president of the Swiss republic, will interest Americans.

When the civil war began in the United States young Frey was at a university in Switzerland, and being moved with patriotic impulse to aid a struggling sister republic he came to this country, went directly to the Swiss colony in Illinois and enlisted as a private in the Twenty-eighth Illinois volunteers.

The Army and Navy Journal says that he served with his regiment until he resigned as second lieutenant on June 17, 1862, to raise a company for the Eighty-second Illinois, in which he served as captain until mustered out with it, June, 1865, having served about four years and constantly in the field.

He was taken prisoner with part of the Eleventh corps at Gettysburg on July 1, 1863, and for a long time was held as hostage under sentence of death and after his release was brevetted a major for gallant and meritorious services.

At the close of the war he returned to Switzerland where he obtained the rank next to the commander-in-chief and was elected to the Swiss federal council and served in the cabinet.

He revisited this country as the first envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Switzerland to the United States, serving through the administrations of Presidents Garfield, Arthur and Cleveland.

The next step of this ex-soldier of the federal army of the United States is, according to the custom of Switzerland, from that of vice president to president of a European republic.
