A portly bartender was engaged in putting out of the saloon a half tipsy individual, who as he reached the door was evidently resolved upon taking satisfaction for the insult out of the beer stinger's well stuffed hide. The ejected, though much the smaller man, slugged the other in the neck, knocking him headforemost out onto the sidewalk, then kicked him in the ribs, and as he strug-gled on his hands and feet to arise the assailant obstructed the attempt by thumping him vigorously about the neck and head, inform-ing him as he held him that he was not done with him yet. Finally the bartender proke away and retreated behind the bar, where he scared his enemy from pursuing him by flourishing a big club, at the same time vainly inviting him to come in, while the ejected one stood in the door and responded with an oft-repeated challenge for him to
