A CLEVER ADVENTURER.

Chicago Post,

"Good evening!" The banker, William Murray, raised his eyes from his ledger. He was some-what surprised, for he did not expect any clients at that hour, at which, as was usual, his office was closing.

The new arrival was a well built, tall roung man, badly dressed. He had entered as the clerk was leaving.
"I was afraid I should be too late," said the visitor, whose voice agreed better with his aristocratic face than did his worn-out clothes. "Permit me to ask how I can serve you," said Murray, without getting up to receive him. "I beg you to be as to receive him. quick as you can, Sir Henry, because I want to get away.' "I will tell you at once," replied the young baronet. "I come to ask you for the loan of £200," Murray eyed the young fellow from head to foot. And the guaranty?" he said, shortly. "My prospects. As you know, I am the presumptive heir of Lord Hervey. I am the nearest of his relations. Murray laughed sarcastically. "Sir Henry," he said, "you know very well that you are somewhat inexact. know from a private source that Lord Hervey has sworn not to give you another penny, and I think you will lieve me when I say that I am perfectly well informed." The face of the young fellow did not change in the least. "But the reason I have called upon you," he said, "is because you know the friendship which your brother-in-law, who is my grandfather's lawyer, has for me, and I want to show you this letter, which he has written to me:"

DEAR SIR HENRY: I have at last the pleasure of sending you a friendly word. Your grandfather, whose health has changed for the worst, desires to see you and bless you before he dies. I advise you to come as quickly as possible. Your old friend,

B. Jameson. "This is really the signature of my brother-in-law," said Murray, after he had read the letter.

"And my best friend," continued Sir Henry. "If he knew the conditions in Henry. "If he knew the conditions in which I am he would certainly help me." "Why do you want this assistance from me?" "Precisely because I want to go to my grandfather, and I require some for the journey." "Ah, weil, I run a risk now and then." "Excuse me," interrupted Sir Henry: but I hear some one moving in an adjoining room." "You must have been mistaken," said the banker, after looking. "There is nobody there. Let us return to our business. I can only let you have £100. "Very well, give me that," said the young man, "and make out your re-The following evening Sir Henry was another man. He had been running about all day engaged in the most varied and agreeable occupation-in paying his debts, in rigging himself out anew. At 6 o'clock in the evening he received from his grandfather's solicitors the following telegram:

The condition of your grandfather is much worse. He will not alter his will until he sees you. Come immediately.

He hastily packed his portmanteau.

A few minutes now would decide his lot, either make him the heir to an estate of $30,000 a year, or leave him as hard up as he ever was, to be reduced some day, perhaps, to beg his bread.

He went into a neighboring hotel, took up a railway time table to find out the quickest and shortest route, lit a cigarette and then started for home.
"I beg your pardon, but could you oblige me with a light?" The speaker was a man dressed in irty, well worn clothes. Poverty had rendered the baronet considerate of others. He stopped at once, and gave the man what he required.

"A fine evening," observed the latter, continuing to walk along by the side of the baronet.

"Yes," replied Sir Henry. "Good He had reached his lodgings, and was preparing to go in when the man stopped

"You arrest me?" "Yes; for the murder of William

"We learned that last night-the night of the crime—a person had been seen to leave Murray's office at a rather late hour. I caused that person to be watched and learned that he made several purchases today, among others some from Smith & Blake the tailors, whom he had paid with a bank note indorsed with the name of the banker,

"The person who paid them that note and left the murdered man's office at such a late hour was yourself?" "I will give you now an exact account of how I passed my time and make you a confidant as to my position," said the baronet, and he hastily did so in as few position.

"Then why can't you help me?"
"I don't see how I can."
"I don't see how I can." "Give me three days' grace. At the end of that time I will come and give myself up of my own accord. I swear it. When I am reconciled to my grandfather I shall have nothing more to days' time. "It is very little that I am offering you, but directly I get possession of the inheritance I swear to you that I will not forget to reward you." "But if I should let myself be over-come by compassion I don't see how I could help you," said the man. "I have no wish to deceive you. At every sta-tion there are police officers with your description. If I let you go free you will fall into their clutches, so it will be all the same."

Yes: but cannot I disguise myself? I will do anything you wish, but I beg of you to let me go. "But how can you disguise yourself?"

continued the detective. Sir Henry had a lucky thought. Ten minutes after the young baronet, having put on the stranger's corduroy trousers, black coat and cloth cap, had gone forth into the street and leaped into a cab, while his protector, in the new clothes, had taken another direc-"Luckily, I have another suit in my bag," said the baronet to himself, throwing himself on to the seat and glancing at his costume. He reached the station in time to get his ticket and to buy an evening paper, so that he might find out the particular of the strange crime. He had hardly thrown his portmanteau into the carriage when the train started.

"At last," he murmured, settling himself in one of the corners. But in an instant after he looked out of the window, terrified as though a person who was standing there under the station awning had been a ghost. This person was William Murray, murdered banker. As the train moved off the baronet maintained his gaze through the window, but suddenly he gave himself a shake and took up the paper. "If he reatly was killed I shall soon know!" he exclaimed.

He looked all through the paper, but could not find a word about the crime. Another piece of news, however, attracted his attention. It was the promise of a reward offered by the police authorities to whoever should give information leading to the capture of an adventurer who had for some time been going around the city committing acts of roguery with the greatest audacity and skillfulness. He continued his reading: "The adventurer wears a cloth cap, a black jacket and corduroy trousers.' With feverish haste Sir Henry took from his bag the spare suit of clothes with which he had provided himself, rapidly arrayed himself in them and as the train passed through the short tunnel before reaching the station he flung the property of the wily swindler out of the window. Twenty minutes after he had reached his destination his grandfather passed away, and he was the possessor of an estate and income of £30,000 per annum.

Terrible Predicament of a Tenderfoot

Mentana. James K. Rochester, who is said to hail from near Boston and who has been in the neighborhood of Flatwillow, Mont., for some weeks for the purpose possible purchases of land for ranch runs, had a few days ago an adventure that, had it not been for the arrival of timely assistance, would have terminated not only fatally, but left his death or loss a mystery until the day of judgment. Rochester had ridden out from this place to the ranch of J. Littleton, with whom he had business, and was returning home when he was caught in one of the unmerous quicksands on the Mussellshell river, a small stream tributary to the Missouri.

Mr. Littleton had accompanied Rochester a part of the way for the express purpose of pointing out to him a place where the river could be forded in safety, but the easterner blundered in the direction, and before he was aware of it his horse began to flounder in the yielding sand. He endeavored to wheel the animal about and get out of the trap, but the horse's legs were already immersed nearly to the knee, and though he tried desperately to obey the rein and extricate himself from the danger which he seemed to understand as well as his rider, it was too late, and his wild plunging only served to involve him still further.

Mr. Rochester then made an attempt to throw himself from the horse's back to the bank of the stream, which was not more than five or six feet distant, but owing to the struggling of the animal he fell short and into the sand. With the strength of desperation he caught at the bridle of the horse and managed to regain the saddle, trusting that the quicksand might prove not too deep for the steed and that presently he would cease to sink, but by this time the pant-ing creature was submerged to the body and the rider was obliged to rise in the saddle and cling to his back.

With anxious eyes the unfortunate man scanned the country about seeking some help, and presently saw some distance off a horseman quietly plodding after some sheep, which he was driving. This man Rochester hailed several times without at first attracting his attention, but the sheep-dog with the drove evi-dently heard the cries, and with the ready intelligence of his species broke away from his wooly charges and tore to the banks of the river barking wildly as he went. His owner in vain tried to whistle him back, then suspecting that the dog had probably scented some wild animal he set out in a gallop after him. As he drew near the stream he heard Rochester's shouts of despair and redoubled his speed, unloosing as he did so the horse hair lariat he carried at the pommel of his saddle. On reaching the quicksand he found that the man had sunk up to his arm pits, while the horse had been completely drawn under, and was, in all likelihood, dead of suffocation. He threw the rope to Rochester, who caught it and managed to secure it about him, when, wheeling his horse about, the herder dragged him from the
