DEPOSITION ALL BUT FATAL

G. B. Tompkins Suffers for Loving His Wife too Well.

Chicago, Oct. 25.—Tossing about on a bed of pain, Luke's special, specially made and partially paralyzed, lies in a hospital, the owner of the Cloverleaf state of race horses.

Somewhere in the east, possibly already on the Atlantic coast for Europe, her golden haired boy with her, is Elizabeth A. Tompkins, famous on two continents as the best authority on the penmanship of female writers on turf topics of modern times.

It all forms a social tragedy almost beyond parallel. A story more fraught with human emotions, devotion and hardships has not been recorded for a long while.

After a fruitless search in every section of the city, exhausted, worn out and pale with grief, Luke's special, specially made and partially paralyzed, lies in a hospital, the owner of the Cloverleaf state of race horses.

Physicians were summoned and the poor fellow labored over for an hour, but to no purpose. Right and cold, his glassy eyes staring unseeingly at the ceiling, he died.

In a fitful sleep for all he held dear on earth, his wife and child, Tompkins had traveled the streets of Chicago for seventy-five hours. He had suspected, but his mind was prejudiced and he would not believe the belief that they were unfounded.

Three weeks ago Mrs. Elizabeth A. Tompkins took her 3-year-old son, the only child, on an extended visit to her parents at St. Louis and the exposition at Chicago. Her stay at St. Louis was brief. She left the Missouri metropolis to come to Chicago October 12, 1911, and on the following day, and what became of her then is shrouded in mystery.
