LINCOLN'S SOCIAL EVIL

Ministers of the City Requested to Suggest a Remedy.

MAYOR WEIR ASKS THEIR ASSISTANCE

How the Capital City's Chief Executive Would Solve the Question—Some Ideas on a Proscribed District as in Omaha.

LINCOLN, Nov. 25.—[Special to THE BEE.]—Mayor Weir's crusade against the social evil is exciting considerable comment. The question has been agitated to a greater or less extent for several months. The ministers of the various churches of the city have taken up the matter with unusual earnestness and as a partial result of their efforts to bring about a moral reform, the inmates of the houses of ill repute have been pretty well demoralized during the past week. Nearly all of them have been arrested and a large number are serving sentences in the county jail. But Mayor Weir recognizes the fact that within a few weeks at most the temporary incarceration of these unfortunate women will have come to an end and that unless further steps are taken the situation will again be as bad as ever.

Inasmuch as the ministers have taken so much interest in the subject, Mayor Weir has decided to ask their advice in the emergency. Today he addressed to each of them the following communication:

Asking for Gospel Light.

Will you kindly give me written answers, briefly and clearly, to the following questions: I have no time to read exhaustive treatises on the subject, but simply want your opinion, concisely and positively expressed.

1. Is it possible to suppress the social evil in our community?

2. Have efforts to accomplish this result been successful elsewhere? If so, what method have you followed?

3. If not, in your judgment, possible to suppress the evil, which of the following methods would you endorse as a means of regulating it? (a) Notify the female inmates of the houses regularly each month to appear at the police court and pay the fine.

(b) Actually arrest the male and female inmates of the houses about once each month and present them at the court for punishment.

(c) Assign these houses to a certain district of the city, require them to pay regularly for the nuisance and each inmate and then force all these people into that district or from the city.

Suggestions on any point other than those suggested will be gladly received.

A. H. Weir, Mayor.

Captured a Suspect.

A man giving his name as John Cox was arrested by the police this forenoon on suspicion of being one of the parties who committed the raid on Mayer Bros. store in the Village of Malcom last Wednesday night. He is a resident of Lincoln and is quite well known to the police. They were attracted this morning by his unusually trim appearance and his general air of well fed prosperity. A quiet investigation was set on foot and it was learned that he was in Malcom the night of the robbery. The police then went to his house and arrested him under arrest. A search of the house revealed a large assortment of goods, which were promptly identified by Mr. Mayer as being taken from his store. Cox will have to do some talk explaining in order to extricate himself from his present difficulty.

More Trouble for McKelghan.

Congressman McKelghan was called into Justice Crown's court this morning to tell why he had not paid a note of $300 which he owed to the defunct Capital National bank. The congressman did not appear in person, but his attorneys were present and they secured a continuance for thirty days. The Capital National bank claim against Congressman McKelghan dates from July 3, 1893. On that date he borrowed $300 of the bank, giving his unsecured note for the same. It was due in ninety days, but has never been paid. The suit was commenced some time ago, but it was impossible to secure service of the papers on the defendant until this week.

Closed Its Doors.

The dry goods establishment of J. H. Mauritz & Co. of this city closed its doors this afternoon. A notice on the door read that the store had been closed by virtue of chattel mortgages given to the State Valley bank of Hutchinson, Kan., and the Columbia National bank of this city, the banks being represented by the legal firm of Field & House of Lincoln. Chattel mortgages were filed with the county clerk this afternoon as follows: Valley State bank of Hutchinson, Kan., $11,410; Columbia National of Lincoln, $7,500; Mills & Gibbs, New York, $2,362.24.

The firm of J. H. Mauritz & Co. has been one of the best known in the city and conducted a fine stocked establishment on O street, near the corner of Eleventh. The firm dealt exclusively in dry goods. Twice during the past two years it has been severely damaged by fire. The losses from this source, together with the general depression in business circles have been more than the firm could stand and hence the failure.

The case attracted much attention and gave the attorneys a wide field for expressions of naughtiness, which they indulged in to the fullest extent.

LEXINGTON, Neb., Nov. 25.—[Special to THE BEE.]—After rejecting nearly 100 men, a jury has been secured for the Walker murder trial and the taking of evidence commenced. The trial promises to be long and stubborn. McNamar, Leek & Sinclair of Kearney appear for the defense with E. A. Cook, county attorney, and Benson of Eustis for the state. The prosecution has clearly established the fact that the crime was premeditated. Walker's grievance against Stevens in this part of the state is well known. The defense will endeavor to establish the fact that Walker is of unsound mind, but pure credulosity seems to be the extent of his insanity. Walker's brother and nephew are here with him.

ADRIFF IN A BARREL

Fearful Experience of the Wife of an Italian Sailor.

The bark Crispo, bound from Jamaica to Puerto Edward island, with a cargo of rum and molasses, put in at New London, Conn., on the 8th inst., for repairs. In the neighborhood of the Bermudas she encountered a small hurricane that weakened her foremast and carried away her flying jib-boom. On board was a woman that was picked up 400 miles north of the Bermudas, floating in a molasses hoghead and nearly dead from exposure and hunger. The woman felt a story of adventure that is rarely met with even in the annals of seafaring life set forth in fiction.

She gave her name as Mrs. Mary Bretano, and according to her story she set sail September 15 from a remote island in the Italian bark Corquenez, of which her husband was captain. They carried a cargo of rum, molasses and spices, and were bound for New York. From the start the Corquenez met with rough weather and made slow headway. When fifty miles southeast of the Bermudas the sailing was washed overboard by a heavy sea and drowned. This accident left the bark with a crew of only six men.

Twenty-three weeks the bark buffeted the heavy seas, making but slow headway; then one of the sailors was stricken with pneumonia, and, in spite of all the crew could do, he died. This left five men aboard the bark, and that number was cut down to three a few days later when a sea came aboard, tore a boat from its fastenings and swept it against the mast and the cook, driving them against the leeward rail and crushing the life out of them.

The two men to assist him, the captain and the mate, were unable to manage the vessel properly. Mrs. Bretano had followed the water with her husband for several years, and her best to assist her husband, but in spite of the efforts of the depleted crew, the vessel sheered around until she sailed squarely into the wind. The sea was so high that the crew were unable to get a footing on the deck, and a few hours later a sea ripped up the wheel and carried it down, and with it the steering gear, leaving the vessel to drift at the mercy of the waves. The captain and his wife were alone, and with the steering apparatus gone, all they could do was to hope for the best.

Twenty-four hours without rest the man and woman toiled at the pumps. Then Mrs. Bretano's strength gave out, and her husband continued alone. The water gained on the pumps, and when a sea came over the stern and swept the length of the bark, tearing up the hold, the water poured into the hold like a cataract. The captain, seeing now that work at the pumps was useless, turned his attention to devising some means of saving his wife. It was a question of a few hours when the vessel would go down, and she was likely to be overwhelmed by the waves that were growing heavier.

With the assistance of his wife the captain managed to get an empty molasses hoghead out of the hold, and lashing it to the mainmast, he cut a square hole in the side of it large enough to admit the body of his wife. Around the barrel he fastened several lengths of strong rope, securely lashing them there, so that the barrel was finally inclosed in a sort of network of rope. To the end of these ropes that hung from the side of the case, opposite the hole, he attached several pieces of pig iron that together weighed a good many hundred pounds. Into the barrel he put provisions and water and wearing apparel, and after all his wife got in. Then the barrel was unlashd from the main mast.

With his wife provided for, Captain Bretano began work on another hoghead that he intended to prepare in the same manner for his own conveyance. He had roped the case and was getting the iron ready for it when a mighty sea threw the vessel on her beam ends and another wave swept the deck clean that was the last that Mrs. Bretano saw of her husband. The case in which she stood was lashed by the weights that hung underneath it, and its extreme buoyancy kept it afloat. The fate of her husband overcame the woman, and she says that she fainted. She must have lain a long time unconscious, for when she again realized her surroundings it was night. The waves were running mountains high, but the cork rod that she had tucked under her chin kept her head above water. She suffered a good deal from the spray that flew through the opening at the top of the case. She had a good supply of provisions in the shape of canned meats and water in bottles.

At the end of two days the wind and the waves subsided and the woman could stand up and take a survey of the sea. She had no idea of her whereabouts, but she hoped that she was in the path of some craft that would pick her up. Her strange vessel stood the wear and tear of the waves splendidly, but she was in constant fear that the weights would become loose, in which case she knew that the cork would roll over and fill.

As nearly as she can calculate, she was afloat five days. On the fourth day she drank the last drop of water that she had under the effect of rousing food she soon found that she was in the path of a vessel of which had been spoiled by the salt spray beating into the opened cans of meat and soaking the biscuits that she became so weak that she could not stand, and hoping for a quick termination of her sufferings she lay helpless in the tossing case. It was on the sixth day that the case was picked up by the Crispo and the woman discovered. She was terribly exhausted, but she was given good care by the captain of the Crispo, and under the effect of nourishing food she soon regained her strength, and but for the grief that she felt at the fate of her husband, she showed no signs of her terrible experience.
