"The Dissolution." It is getting to be quite the thing for

Omaha men to court favor of the muses, The latest timid knocker at their door has me ushered by a perfect prototype of Ward McAllister, a new character in literary circles for which we are indebted to the enterprising New York firm, G. W. Dillingham, who in this role has passed the word that Ritter Dandelyon was only an assumed name for the author of "The Dissolution," and furthermore that he was our own citizen, Samuel A. Brown. For Mr. Brown to write the book was unfortunate; for G. W. Dillingham to lend his name to its publication was a crime against literature, but to tell us Ritter Dandelyon was a citizen of Omaha was an unpardonable blow. In the language of the late Marc Antony, "This was the most unkindest cut of all," for when he gives this gentle tip he inters Omaha intelligence is of the order that devours literature by the taste of the paper. This is not our taste, Mr. Dillingham, so we must refer you to a more "western" town, such, for example, as Honolulu in the realm of ex-Queen Lil, where "The Dissolution"

Then burst into the amphitheater of the tale mounted effusions like to these:
"'Farewell! oh world!' breathes the heaving sigh, and longing and fond is the lingering look, 'yet why, oh gods! have ye lent to this earth the heaven from which we must part!"

wasted upon so fruitless a subject."
Thus "The Dissolution" proceeds amid clashing swords, soul-piercing shricks, swagger and oath, all let loose in ugly, crippled sentences with bad grammer and poor spelling—the whole a patchwork as connected as the discortant images of a dream. It is hard to decide whether the book is a novel or the transcript of a dream; the fact is it cannot be classified, nothing like it having ever before been produced and while the author pronounces it a "projected" drama, we sincerely hope his "projectile" will never be hurled. The work is clearly the unripe fruit of a mind that may at some

"The Austrian Theory of Value" is the title of Prof. S. M. Macyane's latest contribution to economics. It is published by the American Academy of Political and Social Science, and is in the nature of a reply to Prof. F. von Wieser's "Theory of Value," covering points of issue between the Austrian and classical theories. Prof. Mac-vane's defense of the classical side is de-

the subject of "Wool and Manufactures of Wool," by Worthington C. Ford, chief of the bureau of statistics, Treasury department. An instructive chart in the front conveys in colors an impressive object lesson on the relative exports and imports of wool by the countries of the world. In im-ports France leads, with Germany and Great Britain following closely, while in exports the Argentine Republic and New South Wales can give large odds to competitors.

Western life is depicted in a lively style in the new novel of Harry DuBois Milman entitled "Mr. Lake of Chicago." The hero is a distinctly unique character, whose ster-ling qualities when life is imperiled by a rascal's treachery quickly commend him to the regard of Madge Blidgs, the impulsive heroine. Afterwards she spurns him, clinging to a rival wh m he has good reason to know she heartily detests. A series of exciting incidents transpire introducing several boildy drawn characters and exhibiting might have dissolved itself in a harmless and civilized way. We have nothing against "The Dissolu-tion," which is a marvel of literary archi-tecture—too marvelous, indeed, to be profaned by contact with Omaha intellect; and well has its author divined this secret, and well has its author divined this secret, for has he not wisely guarded the approach to this temple of letters with four several anto-chambers in the shape of "preface," "explanation," "prefude," and "prologue," all handsomely decorated in mystic and mythological word paintings, significant mosaics of Egyptian darkness and lightwinged verse o'erfraught with heaviness, breathing a prolonged sigh until the ordeal is passed and the portals of "The Dissolution" are crossed. ion" are crossed.
