A SUBSTITUTE FOR COFFEE. The Soy Bean Declared to Be Equal to the Real Thing.

The agricultural experiment station of the Purdue university of Indiana has issued a circular setting forth the qualities of the soy, or soja, bean and advocating its use as a substitute for coffee.

The seed is planted in rows about thirty inches apart with a bean every eight or nine inches in the row. While May is the time for planting, a good crop has been gathered at the Purdue station.

Analyses of samples of the soy bean grown at the Purdue station and of the true coffee bean are compared in the following table:

Table comparing Soy Bean and Coffee. Columns: Moisture, Protein, Fat, Ash, Carbohydrates, Total strength, Albumin nitrogen, Caffeine.

The cost of the soy bean is said to be very much less than the low-grade coffees and those of which chicory and other adulterants form a part.

Inquiry among New York coffee merchants discovered that the soy bean as a substitute for coffee was not a new discovery.

There is a general impression prevalent that chicory and the other coffee adulterants are detriental to health.
